

MEDIÆVAL INDIA UNDER MUSLIM KINGS

Volume II

THE RISE AND FALL OF
THE GHAZNAWIDS

By

S. M. JAFFAR

Author of "Education in Muslim India,"
"Some Cultural Aspects of Muslim
Rule in India," "The Mughal Empire from Babar to Jahangir,"
etc.

FIRST EDITION 1940

PESHAWAR CITY
(INDIA)

• MUHAMMAD SADIQ KHAN
KISSA KHANI

Published by S Muhammad Sadiq Khan,
Khudadad Street, Peshawar City

Copyright
All rights of reproduction and translation reserved by the author

Printed at The Empire (Elec) Press, Govt Print
Sadar Road, Peshawar (N.W.P.)

DEDICATED

WITH PROFOUND LOVE AND RESPECT

TO

SIR SHAFAT AHMAD KHAN, Kt.,
M A, LITT D, F R HIS SOC, ETC,
HEAD OF THE DEPARTMENT OF HISTORY,
UNIVERSITY OF ALLAHABAD, A VETERAN
HISTORIAN WHOSE ACTIVE INTEREST IN
THE CAUSE OF INDIAN HISTORY HAS LED TO THE RISE AND GROWTH OF THE
MODERN SCHOOL OF INDIAN HISTORY
AND THE
INDIAN HISTORY
CONGRESS

CONTINIS

INTRODUCTION

PP. viii-xviii

APPENDICES

PP. xiix-xxi

CHAPTER I

THE EARLY GHAZNAWIDS

FROM ALPTIGIN TO SUBUKTGIN

Introduction — Alptigin — Ballutin and Turtan — Subuktigin — Causes of his and Qudrat-khan's Afghan — Indo-Afghan Alliance — Reduction of Merv in Independence — Rapid invasion of Ghur — His defeat — His breach of faith and punishment — Importance of Subuktigin's victory — Relation with the Samanids of End — Character and estimate of Subuktigin — his troops pp. 1-2

CHAPTER II

SULTAN MAHMUD THE GREAT

CONQUESTS IN CENTRAL ASIA

Introduction — Early life of Mahmud — Struggle for succession — Relation with Samanid — Defeat with Khan of Turkistan — Conquest of Ghuristan — Battle of Sabiq — Conquest of Sistan — A junction of three Sultanates — Conquest of Ghur — Reduction of Qunduz — Conquest of the valley of Noyan and Qarit — Expedition against Merv — Conflict with Zirvid and the rule of Melik — Conquest of Kavir, Hamadan and Isfahan — pp. 23-48

THE GHAZNAVIDS

CHAPTER III SULTAN MAHMUD THE GREAT - II INVASIONS OF INDIA

Introductory - (1) Towns of Khyber Pass - (2) Peshawar -
(3) Bhatiari - (4) Multan - (5) Bhatiari - (6) Punjab-Nagarkot - (7) Nurwan or Narayapur - (8) Multan - (9)
Thanesar - (10) Nandana - (11) Kashmir - (12) Lutia - (13)
Kurum and Kalinjar - (14) Punjab - (15) Gwalior and Kalinjar - (16) Somnath - (17) The islands of the Indus

pp. 495

CHAPTER IV SULTAN MAHMUD THE GREAT - III MOTIVES & RESULTS OF INDIAN INVASIONS

Introductory - Motives - Political factor - Economic factor - Religious force - Were Indian Invasion Jihād?
Promotion of Islam - Extermination of Infidels - Conquest or territorial annexation - The ie. political motive
The ill and effect of Indian Invasion

pp. 510

CHAPTER V SULTAN MAHMUD THE GREAT - IV CULTURAL ACTIVITIES OF HIS REIGN

CHAPTER VI

SULTAN MAHMUD THE GREAT - V

SOME LEGENDS ABOUT HIM

Introductory — Legend of Firdausi (1) Information contradictory — (2) Sources secondary and devoid of authority — (3) Was Firdausi appointed by Mahmud to write the Milānat? — (4) Apocryphal authorship of the Shāh-nāmeh — The Satire — Charge of bastardy — Mahmud and Avi — The Idol of Somnath — Story of two Dibsh lines

pp. 129-160

CHAPTER VII

SULTAN MAHMUD THE GREAT - VI

CLOSING DAYS, CHARACTER AND ESTIMATE

Introductory — His illness and death — Review of his reign and expression of sorrow — Beginning of the end — Mahmud's character — His personal appearance — His virtues — His religious beliefs and piety — As a soldier and a general — As a king — Mahmud's weaknesses — His estimate

pp. 161-182

CHAPTER VIII

SULTAN MASUD I

Introductory — The war of succession — Releasement and reinstatement of Mumandi — Execution of Ilzamukh — Appointment of new Wazir — Conquest of Mekrin and Kirmiin — Revolts of Ali ud-Daulah and Majid ud-Daulah — Recovery and loss of Khwarizm — Jurjan and Tabritistan — Condition of Idrīz — Tihk's rise — Capture of Hunc and Sonpat — Campaign against Sijhāq — Flight to India — The Wazirat department under Masud — Patronage of learning and promotion of education — Character and estimate of Masud

pp. 183-212

CHAPTER IX

SULTAN MAUDUD & HIS SUCCESSORS

Maudūd — Appointment of Wazirs and Governor of the Punjab — Recovery of Transoxiana — Condition of India — Campaign against the Saljuqs — Abū Ja'far Ma'sūd II — Abul Hasan 'Alī — 'Abdur Rashid — Tughral 'the Ingrate' — Farrukhzād — Ibrāhīm Mas'ūd III — Sherzād and Arslān Shāh — Bahrām Shāh — Rebellion of Indian Governor — War with Ghūrid Maliks — Progress of learning and education — Khusrau Shāh — Khusrau Malik

pp 213 236

CHAPTER X

THE GHAZNAWID GOVERNMENT

Introductory — The nature and functions of government — Toleration — Absence of the Law of Succession — The Central Government — Diwān-i-Wizārat — Diwān-i-'Arz — The Army — Gradation of army officers — Diwān-i-Risālat — Diwān-i-Shughl-i-Ishrāf-i-Mamlukat — Diwān-i-Wikālat — Mazālim — Diwān-i-Muhtasib — Diwān-i-Mumlikat-i-Khās — Sālib-i-Barid — Khāzān — Provincial Government — Administration of cities — Government Service — How India was governed — Revenue System — Taxes and other sources of revenue — Famine Relief — Cultural Progress

pp 237-64

ABBREVIATIONS

(These abbreviations are used only in respect of works which have been frequently cited in this volume. Works rarely referred to are excluded from this list, for their names and those of their authors are given in full in the foot-notes at their proper places)

- | | |
|-----------|---|
| A A | Al-Mukhtasar fi Akhbār-il-Bashār (Cairo edition), by Abul Fida |
| A G I | Ancient Geography of India , by A Cunningham |
| A S I | Archæological Survey of India (Annual Reports) |
| B I S | Bibliotheca Indica Series of R A S B |
| B M | British Museum |
| C H I | Cambridge History of India , The, Volume III, edited by Sir W Haig |
| C G K | Coins of Ghazni Kings , by E. Thomas |
| C M | Chahār Maqāla , by Nizāmī-al-‘Arūzī al-Samarqandī, edited by Maulī Ghulām Muhammad Abūharī |
| C O C | Collection of Oriental Coins in B M |
| E B | Encyclopædia Britannica , The |
| En of Is | Encyclopædia of Islām , edited by T Houtsma and others |
| E & D | Elliot and Dowson's History of India as told by its own historians |
| E M I | Education in Muslim India , by S M Jaffar |
| G D A M I | Geographical Dictionary of Ancient and Mediæval India , by N L Dej |
| G I | Gates of India , The, by Sir T Holdich |
| G M S | Gibb Memorial Series |
| H I | History of India , The, by M Elphinstone |

- H I E A* History of Indian and Eastern Architecture, by J Fergusson
- I A* Isādān Antiquary, The
- I G I* Imperial Gazetteer of India, The
- I K.* Ibn Khaldūn's Kitāb ul-Īoār translated into Urdu by Maulī Hakīm Ahmad Hussain
- J. H* Jawāmi-ut-Hikāyāt, by Awṣī
- J. R A S* Journal of the Royal Asiatic Society of Great Britain and Ireland
- J A S B* Journal of the (Royal) Asiatic Society of Bengal
- J T* Jāmi-ut-Twārikh, by Rashīd ud-Dīn
- K T* al-Kāmil fit-Twārikh, by Allāmā Ibn-ul-Asir, edited by Tornberg
- L E C* Lands of the Eastern Caliphate, The, by G Le Strange
- L H P* Literary History of Persia, The, by L G Browne
- M F* Mahn ild ar-Rirdāusī, by Qizī 'Abdus Samad
- M G* Mal mūd of Ghazna The Life and Times of Sultān, by M Natim
- M I* Medieval India, The History of, by Ishwari Prasad
- Mirāt* The Mirāt or Sind and its Tributaries, by H G Rivett in J A S B
- M Z* Murūj-uz-Zalāb, by Abul Ḥasan 'Alī b. Ḥussain al-Mas'ūdī translated into English by A Sprenger
- N K P* Neval Kishor Press (Lucknow)
- O H I* Oxford History of India, The by V A Smith
- P P M T* Politics in Pre-Mughal Times, by Ishwari Tora
- R S* Rauzat us Safā, by Mīr Khwānd (N K P)

ABBREVIATIONS

S A	Slur-ul- Ajam , by Allāma Shibli Nō'mānī
Sachau	E C Sachau's translation of Alberūnī's Tahqīq mā lil Hind under the title 'Alberūnī's India'
S A M A	Some Aspects of Muslim Administration by R P Tripathi
S C A M R I	Some Cultural Aspects of Muslim Rule in India , by S M Jaffar
S I M H	Studies in Indo Muslim History , by S H Hodivala
S M G	Sultān Muhammūd of Ghaznīn , by M Habīb
S N	Sirāsat-Nāmah , by Nizām-ul Mulk, edited by Schefer
S P L	Studies in Persian Literature , by Hēdī Hasan
T A	Tabqāt-i-Akbarī , by Nizām-ud Dīn Ahmad (N K P)
T B	Tārikh-i-Baihaqī , by Abul Fazl Baihaqī
T F	Tārikh-i Ferishta (Gulshan-i-Ibrāhīm) , by Abul Qāsim Ferishta. (N K P)
T G	Tārikh-i-Gusidāh , by Hamdullah Mastawī (G M S)
T H	Tārikh-i-Hindūstān , by Shams ul-Ulamā Dr Muhammad Zakāullah Khān
T M	Tārikh-i Mas'ūdī , by Abul Fazl Muhammad Hussain al-Baihaqī, edited by Morley
T N	Tabqāt-i-Nāṣirī , by Minhāj us-Sirāj Juz jānī. (B I S)
T S	Tas̄karat-us̄h Shu'arā , by Amīr Daulat Shāh Samarqandī
T Y	Tārikh-i Yamīnī (Kitāb ul-Yamīnī) , by Muhammad bin Muhammad al-Utbī
Z A	Zīrā-ul-Akhbār , by 'Abdul Haī bin Az-Zuhāk bin Mahmūd al-Gardīzī, edited by M Nāzīm

CHAPTER I

THE EARLY GHANIWIDS

FROM ALPTIGIN TO SUBLAKTIGIN

The Arabs were the first Muslim conquerors of India, but they did not carry their conquests far beyond the Indus. Even in Sind their rule did not endure long and they left no lasting legacy behind except that a large part of the population of that place became Muslim in faith. After a period of about two centuries that elapsed after the Arab occupation of Sind, India presented a scene of confusion. A mere geographical expression or a conglomeration of small states, without a paramount power at the centre, showing no signs of national unity — she was rent up by dynastic jealousies and internecine warfare, so much so that even in the event of a common danger the people would not offer a united front. It was on this India that the avalanche of Turkish invasions from the North-West broke and eventually changed the course of her history. After the conquest of the country, the Muslim rulers of India set themselves sedulously to the task of establishing law and order and building up on that foundation an empire capable of protecting the people and opening up new avenues for the advance of their intellect. In the train of Muslim warriors and war-lords came Muslim saints and scholars, poets and philosophers, who permeated the ranks of Indian society and tried to give India that cultural unity without which political solidarity could not be achieved

When the 'Abbāsid Khilāfat began to decline Alptigīn in power and prestige, the governors of the far-flung provinces declared their independence. One of them, Ismā'il by name, Sāmānid by tribe and Tartar by origin, seized upon Khurāsān, Transoxiana and Afghānistān in 872 A C and fixed his capital at Bukhārā, where he founded the Sāmānid Dynasty, which remained in the saddle for more than a century. His son and successor, Ahmad, had a Turkish slave, named Alptigīn, whom he enrolled in his body-guard. Manumitted by the next king, Nasr bin* Ahmad, and entrusted with the command of some troops by his successor, Nūh bin Nasr, Alptigīn rose from that rank to one of Hājib-ul-Hujjāb and acquired immense power and influence after his victory over Bakr bin Malik, the commander of the troops of Khurāsān, in 956 A C. Under the patronage of his youthful master, 'Abdul-Malik, he rose to be the governor of Khurāsān by dint of his ability and industry. On the death of 'Abdul Malik when he was consulted about the appointment of his successor, he voted against Mansūr, the brother of the deceased king. Mansūr having been elected by other Amīrs, the life of Alptigīn was in danger, and government of the territories conquered by him. The places which next felt the force of Alptigin's arms were Bust and a part of the kingdom of Kābul, which were attacked and occupied. After that he led some expeditions against the neighbouring chiefs, defeated the Asghāns of the Khyber Pass and Peshawar valley and established his authority there. But for the fact that he had a very brief reign, he would have considerably extended the area of his kingdom. He passed away in September, 963 A C after a successful reign of about eight months*. He was a just, wise and vigorous ruler.

* Bin, an Arabic word, means 'son of'

Alptigin was succeeded by his son, Abū Bilkātīgīn and Pīrī, but not before he had defeated Abū 'Alī son of Abū Bakr Lawīk, who had driven him out. On his death three distinguished generals of the late king occupied the throne of Ghaznīn one after the other. The first was Bilkātīgīn who is said to have been a very pious, brave and justice-loving man. The second was Pīrī (Pīrtīgīn) who turned out to be 'a great villain'. The reign of this ruler is remarkable for the first clash between Muslims and Hindūs in the vicinity of Ghaznīn. It is narrated that the disaffected people of Ghaznīn, who worked for his overthrow and plotted for his deposition, requested Abū 'Alī Lawīk to make common cause with the Shāh of Kābul and put an end to the rule of

* See p 5, note, and M G , 24—27 and 175—76

Pirītīgīn the tyrant The allies marched against Ghaznīn from their respective places Subuktīgīn, the third general of Alptīgīn and a seasoned soldier, fell upon Abū 'Alī Lawīk with a body of 500 Turks and inflicted a sharp defeat and heavy losses on him The Hindūs, who were advancing under the son of their Shāh (king of Kābul) for seizing Ghaznīn, were successfully repulsed and routed by Pirītīgīn It has been correctly remarked by Sir W Haig that it was "the first conflict in this region between Hindūs and Muslims the former being the aggressors" * Pirītīgīn was deposed on account of his unpopularity and then the third general, i.e., Subuktīgīn, was raised to the throne †

* C H I iii 11

† Some historians have only ignored while others have altogether denied the existence of Bilkātīgīn and Pirītīgīn (Pīrī) which is proved by documentary as well as numismatic evidence. The regnal dates of these two kings as well as of their predecessor and successor are different in different accounts This has led to a heated controversy among modern scholars who have advanced various arguments in support of their respective theories Raverty wrote a fairly long note on the subject and maintained that Alptīgīn ruled for eight years and died in 352 A. H., that his son Is-hāq, who succeeded him, remained in power till 355 A. H., that Bilkātīgīn, who succeeded Is-hāq ruled for eight years and died in 362 A. H., and that Pīrī (Pirītīgīn) came next and occupied the throne till 367 A. H., when he was defeated and deposed by Subuktīgīn (Vide Raverty's translation of T. A., 71-73) Recently Dr Muhammad Nāzīm took up the question again and, after reshuffling the evidence

Subuktigin was originally a descendant of Subuktigin Yazd-Jaro, the last Sāsānid king of Persia, who had been deposed and whose kingdom had been included in the commonwealth of Islām during the Khilafat of Usmān. After the conquest of Persia the members of its royal family do not seem to have seen better days for at least five generations, for we are informed that Subuktigin, who was sixth in descent from Yazd-Jaro, was taken from Turkistān to Buksārā and sold to Alptigin by a merchant named Nast the Hājī* All that we know about his early life is that he was hitherto available tried to close the controversy for good. His conclusions are that Alptigin conquered Ghaznīn about Zil hij 351 A H after a siege of about four months and died after a reign of eight months (not years, as is erroneously said by many, including Ritter) in the month of Shūban, 352 A H, that his son, Abu Is-haq, succeeded him, but not before he had suffered a defeat and exile at the hands of Abu 'Ufi (son of Abu Bakr) Lālik and recovered his kingdom from him after inflicting a defeat on him on the 27th of Shūwāl, 354 A H that Is-haq died on the 25th of Zil qadr, 355 A H, that Bilkūgin ruled for eight or nine years (355-364 A H), and that Pīrī (Pirītigin) remained in power for two or three years (364-366 A H). See M G, 24-27 and 175-176.

* See T F Vol 1, p 18, T N (Cal ed 1864), p 6, and I K, II, xii, 256 ff (translator's note). It may be noted here that Subuktigin was not a born slave. When the fortunes of his family had fallen to their lowest ebb, he was sold by one and purchased by another. Many a man of noble birth, including mighty monarchs, has often suffered this fate. Slavery, moreover, is not an inherent weakness. It is something imposed. Finally, a slave is as good a man in Islām as any other follower of it.

born about the year 331 A H (= 942-43 A C), that his father Jūq, was the chieftain of a minor principality in Turkisān and was renowned for his unusual physical strength, that at the age of twelve his father's principality was raided by a hostile laskar and he was carried away by the raiders, and that he was kept as a prisoner for four years and then sold to Nasr the Hājī, who took him to Bukhārā and sold him to Alptigin. Impressed by the abilities of the promising youth, Alptigin treated him with great kindness and entrusted him with responsible posts, and it must be said to the credit of the latter that he fully justified the confidence reposed in him by the former. His devotion to the descendants of his master cannot be called in question. He served them with unmixed loyalty and enjoyed their confidence and favours till he was elevated to kingship by the people in accordance it is said with the will of Alptigin and married to his daughter*. Not content with what he had, he united the various clans of Afghānistān into a nation and conquered Lamghān and Sistān with their help and extended his sway right up to Khurāsān, and turned his kingdom

* Authorities are not in agreement on this point. In view of the fact that Subuktigin was the fourth in the line of succession (the first 3 being Is-hīq, Bilkatigin and Piritigin) it may be said that the will was not made at all, or if at all it was made, it must have remained a dead letter, for it was not acted upon for a long time for some reason or the other.

into a well-organized and prosperous state

When Subuktigün ascended the throne, Bust

Conquest
of Bust

was occupied by Tughān One of the Sāmānid adventurers expelled him from his stronghold

and occupied it Tughān requested Subuktigün for help and agreed to acknowledge the Amir
as his overlord after the recovery of Bust Subuktigün took up his cause and, after inflicting
a defeat on his rival, restored him to his lost possession After restoration, however, he became lukewarm in owing allegiance His delay in remitting the promised tribute to Ghaznī and the Amir's insistence on it led to a scuffle, in which the latter sustained an injury
at the hands of his vassal But for the timely intervention of his servants, Tughān's career
would have been cut short He took to flight
and sought shelter in Kurmaj, from where he never returned Bust was occupied without encountering opposition and the Sāmānid Chief's Dabir (secretary) Abul Fateh, who had been living in retirement, was brought before the Amir
who treated him with great kindness in recognition of his wide learning and proficiency in arts The learned recluse, it is said, was offered an important post, which he occupied till the death of the Amir, but later he fell out with Mahmūd and
went away to Turkistān *

* T. F., i, 19, and T. H., i, 256

Afghāns who migrated to the border-land between India and Afghānistān and colonized in the territory which comprised Kurmaj, Peshāwar and Shīrāz. This colonization was viewed with grave concern and resented by Jaipāl, the Hindū Rāja of Wāihind, who scented danger from the Afghāns. Some skirmishes followed and pitched battles were also fought, but nothing decisive was accomplished by either party.^{*}

Sometime later the Rāja incurred the displeasure of the Hindū Gakhars who joined hands with their neighbours, the Afghāns, and formed alliances with them against him. Cowed down by this combination, Jaipāl made peace with the Afghāns and also ceded a number of towns from Lamghān to Afghānistān to them for colonization on the condition that they would protect India against all Muslim invasions from beyond. For sometime this policy proved quite effective and the Afghāns defended the Indian frontier well and even checked the Sāmānid advances for Indian booty. Thus India enjoyed immunity from external invasions as a result of the Indo-Afghan alliance. But conditions changed abruptly when the Ghaznawids sprang into power and prominence.

* It is stated that when the belligerents withdrew to their respective places, the people of Kābul and Khalj replied, when inquired about the fate of Musalmāns and the state of affairs in Kohistān, that Kohistān should henceforth be called Afghānistān (i.e. habitat of afghān or noise) because afghān (noise) reigned supreme there. Thus, according to Ferishta, the people are called Afghāns and the place inhabited by them Afghānistān. (T F, 1, 17)

Recognition
of Afghan independence

Alptigin led a number of expeditions against the Afghans and harassed them so much that they could not but seek the aid of the Indian Raja against him. The Raja responded to their request with scant courtesy and treated the frontier problem with indifference. After consulting the Raja of Bhatriya,¹ he disposed it of by handing over to the Afghans the territory inhabited by them so that they might establish their own kingdom which might serve as a buffer state. Thus for the first time did the Afghans have an independent government in their own country. The indifference and aloofness of the Raja, who did not want to meddle in frontier affairs, coupled with the political pressure that was brought to bear upon the Afghans by the Ghaznawid ruler Shaikh Hamid, the Afghan ruler of the Frontier, made peace with Subuktigin and agreed to pursue a policy of neutrality in so far as India was concerned Political expediency, coupled, perhaps, with religious considerations, prompted Subuktigīn to agree to the proposal and enter into an alliance with the Afghāns He scored a brilliant point in that the Afghān blockade, which impeded his advance into India and acted as a stumbling block in his way, was removed with one stroke of political sagacity And, for the Afghāns, it was a question of life and death Their political existence was in danger It was ensured as soon as they made peace with the Ghaznawids and formed an alliance with them Henceforth they ceased to bother themselves about the safety of India Subuktigīn gave them many concessions and won their sympathies and thus cleared his own path to India *

* Various names such as Bhatner, Bhatinda, Bhawalpur, Uchch and Bheri have been advanced as possible identifications of Bhatriya, but none except Bheri can stand the 'crucial test of strategical considerations'. Professor Hodivala has put forward some sound reasons in favour of Bheri (See S I M H, 138-39). Dr M Nizam prefers Bhatinda. For his discussion on the subject, vide M G, 197 ff. I am inclined in favour of Bhera.

The rise of a powerful kingdom under a Muslim monarch in the vicinity of the Indus must have most naturally disturbed Jaipāl's peace of mind and created fears and misgivings in his heart, especially when his dominions lay contiguous to those of his rival, Subuktigīn The recognition of that kingdom spelt the negation of his political suzerainty He had but two alternatives before him either to arrest the rising tide of the Ghaznawid power or to forego his claims to political supremacy and risk the political existence of his own kingdom He decided to follow the first course,

Jaipāl's invasion of Ghaznī and his defeat

and despite the opposition and protestations of the 'whole council, both Brahmans and Kshatriis,' he made preparations and mobilized his forces against his ambitious neighbour. The first great clash between the armies of Islām and those of Hindūism took place at Lamghān in the Khyber Pass.^{*} It was accompanied by a violent storm, rain and thunder, which the superstitious ascribed to supernatural causes,[†] calculated to cause their destruction, so much

* Some modern scholars, (e.g. Dr I. Topi,) never, without assigning any reasons, think the fight did not take place. They give credit to the Rājā for his 'warlike mentality' and say that he was quite prepared for the fight, but changed his mind at Ghaznīn. How he could go as far as Ghaznīn without fighting a battle and then suddenly change his mind and enter into a humiliating treaty is not explained. (See Politics in Pre-Mughal Times, by Dr Ishwari Topi, pp. 28-29.) It may also be noted here that in this clash also the Hindus were the aggressors.

† The phenomenon of storm, rain and thunder, referred to above, is said to have been the direct result of Mahmūd's throwing a filthy thing in a clean fountain of water, haunted by spirits. This tale of wonder, is preserved in the Tārikh-i Yamūni, Tārikh-i-Furishta and other historical works, as a relic of the past. To be brief, it is said that there was a clean fountain of water which became tumultuous and gave rise to black clouds, thunders and snow storms whenever a filthy matter was thrown in it, that Mahmūd, son of Subuktigīn, who was aware of its qualities, caused it to be polluted, and that the results produced caused consternation in the Hindu army who believed that their gods had become angry with them and therefore sent snow-storms etc. for punishing them. This 'tale of wonder' would at once remind the

so that Jaipal himself stood aghast at the horrible sight and saw safety in submission. He sued for peace and his request was accepted. According to the peace treaty that was concluded, the Rājā agreed to the following conditions—
(1) to pay an indemnity of one million dirhams,
(2) to deliver fifty elephants,
(3) to cede some cities and fortresses situated in his kingdom,
(4) to accept the appointment of some officers in India by Subuktigin and (5) to keep some of reder of a number of similar stories, such as the 'miraculous pitcher', 'the lake of wonder' and 'the well of wonder'. It records the survival of an ancient superstition, according to which Nāgas, i.e., demons or dragons—half-human and half brute—residing in such natural reservoirs as springs, fountains, wells and lakes, got offended when anything dirty was thrown in them and poured forth their wrath in the form of such phenomena as tempests, whirlwinds, clouds and snow-storms. It is told by the Buddhist travellers such as Fa Hien and Huen Tsing; and the contemporary Muslim traveller, Alberuni, had also heard of a well in the hills of Farḡānā, which was haunted by spirits endowed with supernatural powers. The phenomenon that caused consternation in Jupāl's army must have been similar to that which destroyed the Anglo Indian army in 1842 A.C.—a snow-storm, and the story that the gods of the Hindus had got annoyed with them seems to have been set up with a view to frighten the Hindu soldiers who had a firm faith not only in supernatural but also in unnatural and even anti-natural causes, and who felt sure that their gods were really angry with them. For references to the tale of wonder vide Tārikh-i-Yamīn in E & D, II, 20, T F I, 19, Dr Sachau's translation of the Asār ul Bāqīra, 235, and S I-M H 134 136

his relatives with Subuktigīn as hostages until the indemnity was paid

Historians are unanimous on the point that when Jaipāl returned safely to his capital and found himself secure from external danger, he thought that the treaty could be set at naught at his own sweet will Behaving in a Kautilyan fashion and regarding the terms of the treaty as a scrap of paper to be torn to pieces, he not only refused to abide by them but also threw into prison the officers whom Subuktigīn had left to see that the Rāja lived up to his words This brazen breach of faith drew down upon him the wrath of the Ghaznawid overlord who marched against him in order to punish him for his perfidy * Jaipāl was not idling away his time He had, in the meantime, prepared himself for the inevitable and enlisted the support of the Rājas of Delhi Ajmer, Kālinjar and Kānauj T He set out to receive the Afghān army with his hordes of Hindūs In the engagement that was

* At first Subuktigīn did not believe the news of Jaipāl's betrayal and, therefore, paid no heed to it. According to 'Utbi, it was only when he was convinced by the repeated accounts' that he had been defrauded and bamboozled that he marched against Jaipāl to punish him for his 'wickedness' and 'infidelity'

T T F , 1, 20 It is, however, contended that Ajmer was not yet founded It is said to have been founded in 1100 A C (Indian Antiquary, xxxvi, 162)

fought on the bank of the Indus, the allies suffered a crushing defeat. After victory, Subuktigīn levied heavy contributions on the neighbouring districts, received assurances from the Rāja that he would remit tribute regularly to Ghaznīn and amassed immense booty, including 200 war elephants. Leaving Peshawar under the command of a trusted officer and putting 10,000 horse at his disposal, the victor marched back to his native Ghaznīn.

Importance of Subuktigīn's victory Politically considered, the result of this invasion was that a mighty Hindū confederacy was defeated and the superiority of the Musalmāns over the Hindūs was established, and though India was not yet conquered, the right route to attack her was discovered, for Subuktigīn was the first Muslim king who invaded India from the North-West Frontier. It may also be noted here that in the first clash between Subuktigīn and Jaīdāl, the latter was the aggressor and the second was the direct outcome of his breach of faith.*

Relations with the Sāmānid overlord When Subuktigīn ascended the throne of Ghaznīn the Sāmānid power was on the wane and the Kingdom of Bukhārā was in the throes of disintegration. Amir Nūh, the Sāmānid King, was hemmed in by insurgents on all sides and the governors of

* T F, i, 27, and C H I, iii, 12

the outlying provinces were in constant rebellion All this afforded a most favourable opportunity to an ambitious leader for the realization of his ambitions, and the Amir of Ghaznīn could have successfully fished in the troubled waters Far from betraying his overlord he continued to acknowledge him as such and gave ample proof of his loyalty and devotion by lending him a helping hand against his enemies When Abū 'Alī Simjūrī* and Fā'iq, two seasoned intriguers joined hands against their overlord, Amir Nūh, the latter called in the aid of Subuktigīn, who was ever ready to help him in his hours of need In response to his request Subuktigīn set out with his forces and reached Herāt, where the insurgents had mustered in strength He opened negotiations with Abū Alī and Fā'iq and proved himself a good peace-maker by prevailing upon them to make peace with their overlord and to pay him an indemnity of 15,000,000 dirhams Not long afterwards, however, Abū 'Alī violated the terms of the peace-treaty and Subuktigīn took the field against him in person, firmly determined to punish him for his perfidy The rebel put up a vigorous opposition, but a timely attack, delivered by Mahmūd decided the day against him When defeated and driven to despair,

* Sir W Haig calls him Abū 'Alī Sunjūr, which is without authority and hence incorrect (C H I, iii, 12)

he fled to Ray and found shelter with Fakhr ud-Daulah The victorious father and son, viz., Subuktigīn and Mahmūd, triumphantly entered Herāt, where they were accorded a right royal reception by the grateful Amīr of Bukhārā Amīr Nūh rewarded the services of Subuktigīn by conferring upon him the government of Balkh and the title of *Nāsir-ud-Dīn-wāa-Daulah and those of his son, Mahmūd, by bestowing upon him the command of the troops of Khurāsān and the title of Saif-ud-Daulah When Mahmūd entered Nishāpur he was taken by surprise by the forces of Abū 'Alī Simjūrī and Fā'iq and the town was occupied by them After this reverse Mahmūd retreated to Herāt and reorganized his forces there When Subuktigīn learnt of this disaster, he marched post-haste and attacked Abū 'Alī Simjūrī Again a timely attack delivered by Mahmūd decided the day in his favour Fed up with fruitless struggles and humiliated by repeated reverses, both Abū 'Alī and his friend, Fā'iq, made pourparlers for peace to Amīr Nūh When their ambassadors reached Bukhārā, the Amīr threw into prison the one sent by Fā'iq and received with marked respect the one sent by Abū 'Alī This was done with a view to breaking down their combination When Fā'iq learnt of the fate of his ambassador, he

* Subuktigīn already enjoyed the title of Mu'in-ud-Daulah (Vide Sachao The Chronology of Ancient Nations, p 130)

fled to Ilak Khān and sought his interference, while Abū Alī was taken prisoner on his arrival at Bukhārā and made over to Subuktigīn for safe custody. Meanwhile Fā'iq had prevailed upon Ilak Khān to launch an attack on Bukhārā. When Nūh heard of the impending invasion of Bukhārā by Ilak Khān, he again invoked the assistance of Subuktigīn. Ever willing to furnish proof of his fidelity, the Amīr of Ghaznī set out at the head of his army to the help of his overlord. On reaching Bukhārā, however, he found that Amīr Nūh had changed his mind and was not prepared to meet the invader under the advice of his minister, 'Abdullah bin Muhammad bin Uzair. But for this, he would have plunged himself into a decisive war against Ilak Khān. He too, however, now made peace with Ilak Khān and ceded all the Sāmānid territory to the east of Qatwān to him. At the same time he also sent his son, Mahmūd, to Bukhārā at the head of 20 000 horse to bring about the dismissal of the cowardly Vasīr, Abdullah. Frightened out of his wits, Amīr Nūh dismissed 'Abdullah and appointed another Vasīr nominated by Subuktigīn.* A little later when Subuktigīn and Mahmūd were both away from Khurāsān, 'Abul Qāsim, brother of Abū Alī Sīmjūrī, availed himself of their absence and occupied Nishāpur without encountering much opposition. His success was, however, short-lived, for he had to evacuate the place on the arrival of Mahmūd and his uncle, Bughrājuq,* from Herāt

Character & estimate of Subuktigīn

Amidst these transactions, at the height of his power, Subuktigīn, who was exhausted by the strain and stress of ceaseless war and conquest, sank and quietly passed away in 997 A C, bequeathing a fairly large and well-organized kingdom to his son, Mahmūd. He was a brave, righteous and upright ruler, who combined in his person the qualities of a soldier and a statesman. He ruled his kingdom with great prudence, justice and moderation for full twenty years. He has gone down in history as an Amīr-i-'Adī or Just Ruler, who was adored and obeyed by his soldiers, whose sufferings he shared, and loved and respected by his subjects, whose interests he always tried to promote. His loyalty and devotion to the Sāmānid King, whom he acknowledged as his suzerain, stand in dramatic contrast to the treason and treachery of the Bukhāran nobility in relation to their overlord and reflects great credit on his character. Towards the close of his reign he had grown so strong that foreign potentates eagerly sought his friendship. He was a really great lover of learning and an equally great patron of the learned. His advice to his son Mahmūd, who rose to be one of the greatest patrons of literature,

* Vide T Y, 75-107, T M, 235, Z A p, 58, T N, 75, and M G, 30-32

is particularly interesting. He told him to conquer the hearts of the literary luminaries of his kingdom by looking after their welfare and carrying out their wishes, pointing out that his generosity in this sphere would immortalize his name.* The treatment meted out by him to Abul Fateh, the Dabir of the Sāmānid Chief, after the expulsion of Tughān from Bust is a glowing tribute to his patronage of learning.† Later Muslim historians have tried to represent him as a champion of Islām whose principal occupation was to wage wars with the infidels of India and to propagate his religion with fire and sword despite the fact that he 'never crossed the Indus and led only two expeditions against the Hindūs'. His hands were too full of affairs at home to allow him time to draw out his sword and propagate Islām in India at its point. It was only on two occasions that he had to fight the Hindūs of India and that too for political reasons. The first of his Indian expeditions was undertaken when he was attacked by Rāja Jaipāl of Lāhore and the second when the Rāja proved perfidious and violated the terms of the treaty solemnly entered into after his defeat in the first expedition. Sir W Haig is perfectly right in saying that 'these expeditions were undertaken rather as measures of reprisal and for the purpose of securin

* T F, i, 31

† See supra, p 8

his dominions than with any intention of propagating the faith'*. There is absolutely no doubt that as a good Muslim he was profoundly interested in the cause of Islām, but it will be too much to credit him with what he never did or attempted to do. He did not propagate Islām in India at the point of the sword. In fact he did not propagate it there even by peaceful means. Apart from the fact that his sway was confined only to a fringe of the Indian Continent, the rest of which remained untouched by him, his political pre-occupations left him but little leisure to do so. This is the verdict of history.

From the preceding account it is evident that about the end of the 10th century the Ghaznawid Empire was in the making. The Retrospect Ghaznawids, with the solitary exception of Alptigīn, the founder of the dynasty, were gradually exerting themselves and asserting their authority in the name of the Sāmānid King. Their motives were political and economic and not religious—creation of an independent empire of their own and its maintenance and not the propagation of Islām and its principles and practices in India. They had but one end in view, i.e., political aggrandizement, and they laboured to achieve it by all legitimate means. The Sāmānid name and authority served their purpose well and they exploited these words fully to their best advantage Under this political cloak the Ghaznawid power expanded unseen and without exciting jealousies or awakening rivalry The main object of the growing Ghaznawid State was to strengthen itself and to cement its foundations and to develop itself into a powerful empire It was for purely political considerations that the Ghaznawid rulers acknowledged the suzerainty of the Sāmānid King, otherwise they had little regard for him or for his power and prestige This is borne out by the fact that they freed themselves from the nominal political tutelage of the Sāmānid Sovereignty the moment they felt themselves strong enough to curb the opposition of their enemies The foundations of the great Ghaznawid Empire were laid by Subuktigīn and the splendid superstructure was raised by his more famous son and successor, Mahmūd, under whom it became a living force, a real symbol of power and a sure sign of authority

* C H I , iii, 12

CHAPTER II

SULTAN MAHMUD THE GREAT - I

HIS CONQUESTS IN CENTRAL ASIA

Introduc^tory Mahmūd is really the first remarkable figure in the history of Muslim India to claim our serious attention. He was the real maker of the Ghaznawid State and the first Muslim conqueror of a considerable part of India. Under him the semi-independent State of Ghazni rose to a full-fledged and fully developed Ghaznawid Empire. He picked up the policy of his father, pursued it with prudence and carried it to its logical conclusion. Though it is only in a limited sense that he can be regarded as a ruler of India, yet the shade-work he did and the ground he prepared for the establishment of a Muslim empire in India cannot be ignored, and it is mainly in this capacity that he deserves a prominent place in Indian history.

Early life of Mahmud Abul Qāsim Mahmūd was the eldest son of Subuktagin from his wife who was the daughter of an Amir of Zabulistan.* In spite of the efforts of his historians medieval as well as modern,

* S. N. 108, T. I., 1, 23 and T. G., 395. It is for this reason that Mahmud was also known as Mahmud-i-Zibuli.

the early life of this mighty monarch of his age still remains wrapped in obscurity. A few stray facts bearing on the subject are known and they will not be out of place here. He was born on the night between the 1st and 2nd of November, 971 A.C.* He received his early education on orthodox lines under the tuition of a learned man. Well-grounded in various branches of Islamic literature, he knew the Holy Qurān by heart and was fully conversant with Muslim law and Tradition. His father was particularly keen about the education of his children. He himself had instructed Mahmūd in the science of statecraft and crystallized its principles, as propounded by himself, into a Pand-Nāmah. Mahmūd, moreover, seems to have undergone a regular course of apprenticeship in the art of administration. We find him acting as a deputy of his father during his absence from Ghaznīn. He was hardly seven years of age at that time. Later he was entrusted with the government of the province of Zamin-Dawar. He was given a regular training in the military arts and sciences of his day His skill and proficiency as a swordsman, lance-fighter and marksman were par excellence As a constant companion of his father in his military expeditions, he had picked up experience, which proved so useful in his career of conquest We have had occasions to meet him as a lieutenant of his father on a number of battle-fields During his boyhood he gave a good account of his military genius by successfully conducting a punitive expedition against Ghūr He acquitted himself creditably in a battle that took place between his father and Jaipāl near Lamghān in 986-87 A C As a result, perhaps, of some court intrigue, he fell out with his father and was thrown into prison This estrangement was, however, short-lived The misunderstanding was soon removed and Mahmūd was restored to filial favours Mahmūd's services to the Sāmānid King against Abū 'Alī Simjūrī and Fā'iq, in conjunction with his father, have been dealt with and need not be dilated upon here * He was at Nishāpur and in the 26th year of his life when he heard the sad news of the death of his father †

* Historians have spun some strange stories round the birth of Mahmūd. For instance, at one place it is recorded that his birth 'synchronized with the falling down of an idol-temple at Waihand, and that shortly before his birth Subuktigin saw in a dream a tree issuing out of the chafing-dish in his room and spreading out rapidly so as to overshadow the whole world, thus presaging the future iconoclast and conqueror' (M.G., 34, note 3, T.F., 1, 23, and T.N., 76). Such stories are not peculiar to the case of Mahmūd. Similar stories are told about the birth of Alexander the Great (See Plutarch's Lives, II, p. 104).

In accordance with the will made by Subuktigīn a few days before his death, the nobles of Balkh raised his younger son, Ismā'il, to the throne and proclaimed him as their

Struggle for Succession

* See supra, pp 16 ff

† See M G, 34 ff

king With a view to strengthening his position, the new king did homage to his Sāmānid overlord and to win the good-will of the army he lavishly distributed wealth among his soldiers There was, however, a party of the people who believed that fitness to rule was the first and foremost qualification for succession to the throne That party espoused the cause of Mahmūd, who was the elder and decidedly the abler and more energetic of the two brothers Mahmūd, who was no less ambitious than Ismāīl, refused to acquiesce in the settlement He wrote a letter of condolence to his brother Ismāīl, assured him of his fraternal love and asked him to retain Balkh and cede Ghaznīn to him in recognition of his superior rights He also pointed out in that letter that he would not have disputed the will of his father if Ismāīl had possessed the requisite qualifications for kingship The demand was not met and the rival claimants referred the matter to the arbitrament of the sword At this juncture Abul Hāris Farīghūnī, father-in-law of Mahmūd, tried to patch up the differences between the two brothers, but he was considered as an interested mediator and thus his efforts to bring about a compromise ended in smoke After that the two brothers mobilized their forces and advanced on Ghaznīn from their respective places—Mahmūd from Nishāpur and Ismāīl from Balkh Before they met on the battle-field, Mahmūd won over his brother, Abul Muzaffar Nasr, the governor of Bust, and his uncle Bughrājuq, the governor of Herāt, and made a final attempt at compromise, but that too suffered the same fate. His father-in-law had already thrown the weight of his power and influence on his side and now there was nothing to check him from asserting his claims by force of arms. The two armies, almost equal in numerical strength, met on the plain of Ghaznīn and a well-balanced battle was fought in March, 998 A.C. Ismā'il, who was more of a scholar than a soldier, held out heroically for the whole day, but eventually bowed before the calm and cool courage and superior generalship of his brother. Towards the close of the day Ismā'il's forces took to flight and he himself sought shelter in a fort, but feeling sure that he could not sustain a long siege, he threw himself at the mercy of his brother, who had promised to treat him with kindness. After winning a decisive victory, Mahmūd placed Ismā'il 'in nominal confinement' and provided him with every comfort and convenience. About the end of 999 A.C. Ismā'il abused the indulgence shown to him by his brother and hatched up a plot against him. Before the nefarious plan was put into practice, Mahmūd got an inkling of the plot*

* How Mahmūd came to know about the plot is thus stated by 'Utbi —

One day the Sultān went out hunting in company with Ismā'il and Nushtigīn. On the way he saw the latter putting his hand on the hilt of his sword and looking towards the former for some pre-arranged signal. Mahmūd and immediately ordered the execution of Dushagin kāj who was the principal agent. After that Ismālī was transferred to the custody of Abū Ḥirās al-Jādī, where he passed the rest of his life in peace.*

After resisting law and order in Ghaznī Reunions with the Sāmānid Mahmūd marched to Balkh and paid his respects to Amīr Abū Ḥirās Mīnāsūr, who had succeeded his father Amīr Nūh. The Amīr congratulated him on his success against his brother and confirmed him in his government of Balkh, Herāt, Bust, and Tirmidz. As regards Khurāsān the Amīr said that he had already granted it to Begzūrūn an officer who wielded enormous influence in Bukhārā† Mahmūd made another constitutional attempt to get back Khurāsān. He sent Abū Ḥisān Ḥarmūd to Bukhārā to plead his case, but the Amīr declined to do what he desired. Failing to achieve his object by peaceful means, he resorted to force. He advanced against Nishāpur. At his approach Begzūrūn deserted the place.

detected the move and Ismālī, seeing that the Sultan had seen Nushtūn's treachery, showed himself unconcerned (T G, 132)

* T G, 393, T Y, 110, 114-16, 118, 128-32 T I, 1, 22 and J G, 38-41

† For the events leading to the appointment of Begzūrūn to the command of the troops of Khurāsān, see M G, p. 42, note 2

and applied for reinforcements. The Amīr hastened to the scene for helping him and halted at Sarakhs. Mahmūd, who had occupied Nishāpur in the meantime, left it without fighting a battle and retreated to Marv-Rūd.* Nishāpur was re-occupied by Begtūzūn, who next marched to Sarakhs to join the Amīr. Suspecting the Amīr of secretly favouring Mahmūd, Fā'iq and Begtūzūn formed a plot against him, took him prisoner on the pretext of a meeting in connection with an alleged problem of importance and then enthroned Abul Fawāris Abdul Malik, a younger brother of Amīr Abul Hāris. Mahmūd now took up the cause of the ex-Amīr and proceeded to Sarakhs to punish Fā'iq and Begtūzūn. At his approach, both the traitors fled to Marv. Mahmūd pursued them thither and actually encamped in front of that place. Before, however, the fight began the parties came to an understanding, whereby Begtūzūn was allowed to retain the command of the troops of Khurāsān as before and Mahmūd was confirmed in his possession of Herāt, Balkh, etc. Thus ended the campaign without achieving the object for which it was launched †. The peace concluded was short-lived. It was broken as soon as the followers of the Amīr, instigated by Dārā bū Qābūs who was opposed to the terms

* Utbī accounts for this unconditional retreat of Mahmūd by saying that he disdained to deal the final blow to the Sāmānids. (T Y, 124)

† See Z A, 60, and T M, 805. It is stated that of the army, attacked the rear of Mahmud's forces under the command of Nasr. This was enough to serve as a catalyst for Mahmud. Marshalling his forces in the army and distributing the commands of the main divisions of his army to trusted officers he attacked the combined forces of Amir Abu'l-Mulk Begdān, Fiqār ibn Abūl-Qasim Simjūrī, and defeated them in a battle near Mary on the 16th of May 999 A.C. Abu'l-Mulk fled to Bukhārā, Abūl-Qasim to Kohistān and Begdān to Nishāpur. Driven out of Nishāpur Begdān fled to Jurjanāzā when he was pursued thither also he crossed over to Bukhārā. Abūl-Qasim, who had established himself in Kohistān was arrested by an officer of Mahmud, deserted and dislodged from the post on he had occupied. Nāsimūs was now the master of the whole of Khurāsān. Entrusting the command of the troops of that province to his brother Nasr he proceeded up to Balkh to see the state of affairs at Bukhārā. About this time he informed Al-Qādir Bilāh, the Khalifa of Baqīqād of his victory over Abu'l-Mulk and received from him a diploma of investiture and the titles of Amīn ul-Ullāh and Yamīn ud-Da'wah. Abu'l-Mulk was preparing himself for a final fight with Mahmud when the death of his skilled and seasoned Mahmud was so pleased with this result that he distributed 2,000 dinars as alms among the poor. Why he felt delighted at this unsatisfactory peace treaty is not explained.

general, Fā'iq, brought his schemes to an abrupt close. At the end of October, 999 A.C. Ilak Khān conquered Bukhārā, captured the Amīr together with his kith and kin and put an end to the Sāmānid Dynasty. Abū Ibrāhīm Ismā'il al-Muntasir, son of Amīr Nūh, who had managed to escape from the custody of Ilak Khān, made abortive efforts to retrieve the fallen fortunes of his family. In Khwārizm he enlisted the support of those who still clung to the cause of the Sāmānids. With their help he attacked Bukhārā, but failed to take it. Thereafter he attacked Nishāpur and inflicted a defeat on Nasr on February 25, 1001 A.C. When, however, Mahmūd arrived with reinforcements, he fled to Jurjān. In September next he appeared again in Khurāsān. At his approach Nasr evacuated Nishāpur and applied for reinforcements. Mahmūd sent Abū Sa'id Altūntāsh to his help and the combined forces made an attack on Muntasir, who suffered a crushing defeat and took to flight. Ere long he came back from Jurjān, whither he had fled, and took Sarakhs. He was defeated by Nasr and many of his officers, including Abul Qāsim, were taken prisoners and sent to Ghaznīn. Muntasir tried his luck in Transoxiana and other places, but failure followed him everywhere. He now made an appeal for help to Mahmūd who issued instructions to the governor of Herāt to join forces with him in his venture against Ilak Khān. Without waiting for reinforcements, he marched against Bukhārā and after suffering heavy losses returned to Khurāsān. To put a stop to the disturbances he was creating in his new dominions, Mahmūd sent a large army against him. He fled to Jurjān and made yet another unsuccessful attempt to recover Bukhārā. His stormy career was cut short by an Arab in the Ghuzz desert.

After the conquest of Bukhārā by Ilak Khān* and that of Khurāsān by Sultān Mahmūd, the two great conquerors of their day exchanged friendly greetings and accepted Dealing with the khāns of Turkistān the river Oxus as the boundary-line between their kingdoms. To strengthen this friendship, Mahmūd married the daughter of Ilak Khān. But the Khān coveted the province of Khurāsān so much that even this matrimonial alliance did not exercise any check on his ambitions. No sooner had Mahmūd marched against Multān, than he detailed two divisions of his army against Khurāsān—one under the command of his brother, Chaghartīgīn, and the other under that of his relative, Subāshītīgīn. The two generals conquered Balkh and Herāt and with their conquest the whole of Khurāsān passed into the hands of Ilak Khān. Mahmūd had anticipated this invasion and had therefore issued necessary instructions to his officers before his departure from Ghaznīn. As soon as he

* Muslim historians call these Khāns of Turkistān 'Afrāsīvābī Turks' and modern historians call them 'Qarā-Khānidz' (M G, 47, p 3)

the people of Transoxiana against the tyranny of 'Alītigīn provided a most plausible pretext and Mahmūd marched against Samarqand where 'Alītigīn had taken his stand. At his approach 'Alītigīn took to flight, but his wife and children were taken prisoners and treated with respect consistent with their position. Qadir Khān of Kashghar and Mahmūd exchanged greetings and cemented their friendship by matrimonial alliances. While Mahmūd married his daughter, Zainab, to Qadir Khān's son, Bughrā Khān,* Qadir Khan gave one of his daughters in marriage to Muhammad, son of Mahmūd † Hardly had Mahmūd left Samarqand for Ghaznīn when 'Alītigīn emerged from his retreat, defeated Qadir Khān and took possession of Samarqand. Qadir Khān sought but failed to secure the support of Mahmūd, because the latter was about to proceed against Somnāth. On his return, however, Mahmūd sent a large force to Qadir Khān who defeated 'Alītigīn and compelled him to come to terms. Thereafter Qadir Khān continued to be friendly towards Mahmūd.

The Ma'mūnids, * e., the rulers of Jurjāniyyah, were at first the feudatories of Jurjāniyyah, but became independent later on. One of them, Abul Hasan 'Alī, married Mahmūd's

* His original name was Yaghāntigīn (T M, 230)

† For marriage ceremonies etc., see Z A, 83-84, and T M, 230-31

sister called Kāh-Kaljī His brother Abul Abbās, who succeeded him, married his widow and professed to possess profound respect for Mahmūd When, however, the Sultān asked him to acknowledge him as his overlord he referred the matter to a council of officers who refused to submit to foreign yoke When the soldiers learnt of this, they mutinied, but were silenced by a lavish distribution of gold This was, however, a lull before the storm that was yet to come Finding himself between the devil and the deep sea 'Abbās contracted a secret alliance with the Khāns of Turkistān When Mahmūd heard of this secret alliance, he set out with a huge army against Balkh But for the timely intervention of the Khāns of Turkistān Mahmūd would have dealt a decisive blow to his brother-in-law 'Abbās had now no alternative but to submit He acknowledged Mahmūd as his suzerain and inserted his name in the Khutba The soldiers, who had been silenced only with gold, regarded this submission as a standing insult to the honour of their country They advanced on the capital and perpetrated a number of atrocities which culminated in the assassination of Abul Abbās On hearing of the tragic fate of his vassal and brother-in-law, Mahmūd marched against Khwārizm at the head of his army Before taking action he arranged the safe return of his sister and secured the neutrality of the Khāns of Turkistān The regicides inflicted heavy losses on the Ghaznawid forces, but ultimately victory sided with the Sultān. The rebels were completely crushed and the murderers of 'Abul Abbās were put to the sword. The government of Khwārizm and Jurjāniyāh was entrusted to Amīr Hājib Altūntāsh, who had distinguished himself in the fight, and the title of Khwārizmshāh was conferred upon him in recognition of his services. After introducing necessary administrative changes and making appointments and transfers, Mahmūd marched back to Ghaznīn.

Abū Nasr Muhammad bin Asad-ash-Shār was wise enough to bow before the rising star of Sultān Mahmūd. Conquest of Ghrisbisan He acknowledged the Sultān as his suzerain and read the Khutba in his name. But his son, Shāh Muhammad, the younger Shār, offended Mahmūd by refusing to accompany him on an expedition and behaving improperly when called upon to explain his conduct. As a result, Gharshistān* was attacked. The elder Shār submitted, but the younger took position in an almost inaccessible hill-fort and from there offered resistance. The fort was besieged and a breach was made in one of its outer walls. The garrison held out heroically, but eventually they sought safety in surrendering themselves. Shāh Muhammad was made captive along with a number of his officers and sent to Mastang,* where he died some time later. Ghurshistān was annexed to the Ghurshāwīd Empire and placed in charge of Abū Ḥasan-al-Malī's, governor of Marv-Rūd, in 1012 A.C. The elder Shāh was taken to Ghurshān and treated with marked respect.

* Gharshistān is also called Gharjistān and Gharj ash Shar in some accounts.

The origin of the Saljuqs is shrouded in the thick mist of antiquity. There are several conflicting accounts about them. Of them, the most probable seems to be this. An important section of the Ghuzz tribe shot off from the parent-stock under their leader, named Saljuq, after whose name it came to be known later on, and migrated to Transoxiana and settled down there. At times they rendered help to the Sāmānidids in their wars with their neighbours of Turkistān. By lending a helping hand to 'Altigīn in his conquest of Bukhārā, Isrā'il son of Saljuq acquired immense influence at Bukhārā. When Mahmūd marched against Transoxiana, 'Altigīn managed to make good his escape but Isrā'il fell into his hands, was taken prisoner and sent to the fort of Kalanjar.† According to an account, the Saljuqs were either induced or forced to migrate to the south of the Oxus and settle down in Khurāsān.

* Mastang is situated in modern Baluchistān.

† This Kalanjar was different from the fort of Kalanjar, situated in Bundhelkhand. It was situated to the north of Jhelum in the pass leading into Krishnātīr (Vide M.G., 64 foot note).

It seems more probable, however, that they remained in Transoxiana, owning allegiance to the Sultan and waging wars on their own account till the close of his reign when they began to make encroachments upon his immediate possessions. Lest they should become a menace to his power, Mahmūd led a number of expeditions against them personally and defeated them in many battles. They were held in check at that time and they could not enter Khurāsan in force until the accession of Sultan Mas'ūd to the throne.*

When Bughrājuq, the governor of Fūshanj,

Conquest of Sistān had gone to help Mahmūd in his struggle for the throne, his province was occupied by Tāhir son of Wali-ud-Daulah Abū Ahmad Khalaf bin Ahmad, the governor of Sistān, who had become independent after the fall of the Sāmānids. After his accession Mahmūd helped Bughrājuq and enabled him to recover his province, but he pursued the enemy in a state of drunkenness and got killed. In December, 999 A.C. Mahmūd marched against Khalaf and forced him to purchase peace on payment of 100,000 dīnārs as indemnity. After that the Sultan returned to his capital. Subsequently a quarrel took place between Khalaf and his son, Tāhir, and the father managed to imprison his son and put him to death. Insurated by this, act of Khalaf, the people invited Mahmud to rescue them from his tyranny. In response, the Sultan set out at the head of his army and laid siege to the fort of Sistan. Khalaf offered a stubborn resistance, but sought safety in submission. Mahmud excused him his pardon, allowed him to retain his riches and sent him to Juzjanan at his own choice. After appointing Hajib Qaziji as governor of Sistan, the Sultan went back to Ghaznī. Not long after his departure a rebellion broke out in that province and Mahmud had to take the field in person. He put down the rebellion and massacred a large number of the rebels. Placing the province in charge of his own brother Nasr, Mahmud returned to Ghaznī.

* See K. T., ix, 266 68 and 321 ff., T. N., 116 ff., T. G., 434-35, Z. A., 84 ff., and Ency. of Islam, ii, 168 ff.

According to the Tarikh-i-Guzidah when Khalaf bin Ahmad of Sistan was deserted by Mahmud, he addressed the victor as 'Sultan'—an appellation which signifies authority or power—and the latter liked it and adopted it as his title, giving up that of Amir.^{*} Baizawi, on the other hand, would have us believe that the Khalifa of Baghdad (Al-Qadir Billah) confirmed Mahmud in the government of Khurasan and Sistan, sent him a robe of honour and also conferred upon him the title of 'Sultan' in honour of his victory over Abdul Malik.[†] This seems to be improbable for the simple reason that Mahmud never

Assumption of the title of 'Sultān'

* T. G., 396, and Cards of Ghazni Kings, 5

† S. A. M. A., 9, foot note used this title in his coins and remained content with the title of Amīr, with which the Khalifa distinguished him ^{*} There is a strong tradition that Mahmūd was the first king who styled himself as Sultān [†]

Muhammad bin Sūrī,[‡] the ruler of Mandish (eastern Ghūr), acknowledged the Conquest suzerainty of Subuktigīn, but of Ghūr renounced allegiance after his death and adopted a hostile attitude In 1011
A C Mahmūd marched against him The Ghūrids pooled their resources, offered him a united front and inflicted a defeat on Altūntash who led the advance-guard. Mahmūd joined him immediately afterwards and their combined forces defeated the Ghūrids in some engagements After these reverses, Ibn Sūrī retired to the inaccessible hills from where he could not be dislodged Mahmūd resorted to a ruse He turned back and feigned flight The simple unassuming Ghūrids now rushed out in pursuit of the Ghaznawids, and when they reached a plain Mahmūd turned round and made a desperate charge on the disorderly hordes and scattered them pell-mell Ibn Sūrī, his son and officers were taken prisoners and sent to Ghaznīn Abū
'Alī son of Ibn Sūrī, who had quarrelled with

^{*} C H I , III, 14, foot-note

[†] S N , 44, K T , II, 92, T N , 75; and W Barthold's Turkestan, 271

[‡] 'Utbi calls him simply Ibn Sūrī Also see M G , 70, foot-note 4

his father had taken refuge at Ghaznīn, was made governor of Manāsh. In 1015 A.C. Mahmūd attacked Khwāzin,^{*} captured some forces and returned to Ghaznīn. Some time later the north-western part of Ghūr, called Tīb, was conquered by Mīsūd and almost the whole of Ghūr excepting perhaps the inaccessible interior, was annexed to the Ghaznawid Empire.

Reduction of Qusar Qusar was converted into a dependency of Ghaznīn by Subukgūn. In 1010-11 A.C. its ruler renounced allegiance and withheld tribute at the instigation of Iltak Khān. In December, 1011 A.C. Mahmūd mobilized his forces against it and laid siege to its fort. Its ruler offered submission and promised to pay 15,000 000 airhams,[†] as an indemnity to deliver fifteen elephants and to remit the annual tribute regularly. In return for all this he was allowed to retain his kingdom as a dependency of Ghaznīn.

Conquest of the valleys of rivers Nār and Qīrū In 1020 A.C. Mahmūd undertook an expedition against 'the pleasant valleys' of the rivers Nār and Qīrāt.[‡] While the ruler of the Qīrāt valley offered submission and accepted Islam

* This was the south western district of Ghūr (Ibid. V. G. 72, foot note 4).

† Ibid. 70 ff.

‡ T. Y. 250 51. That the amount is rather exaggerated admits of no doubt.

§ These rivers are in modern Kafiristān.

with most of his men, that of the Nûr valley adopted a hostile attitude, but had to bow before the might and means of Mahmûd. The people of these valleys worshipped the lion and were apparently Buddhists who worshipped the Sâkiya Sinha (lion), the Buddha. Mahmûd appointed a number of teachers to acquaint them with the rudiments of Islâm and returned to Ghaznîn.*

Expedition against the Afghâns At the end of the year 1019 A C Mahmûd marched against the Afghâns,† who inhabited the region between Ghaznîn and the Indus. He inflicted a most severe chastisement on the Afghâns who used to make raids into the frontier towns of the Ghaznavid Empire and had become so daring as to waylay the Imperial forces on their way back from Kanauj. It is said that very few, except women and children, escaped the terrible execution ordered by the Sultân.

Relations with the Ziyârids Subuktigîn had promised Shams-ul-Mâ'âlî Abul Hasan Qâbûs bin Washm-gîr bin Ziyâr to restore his kingdom (Jurjân and Tabaristân) to him, but died before fulfilling the promise. Mahmûd wanted to do what was left undone by his father on account of his death, but accomplished nothing. Qâbûs was, however, able to occupy Jurjân in August, 998 A C and to establish his sway over Tabaristān and Jibāl. He was not destined to enjoy a long reign. He was deposed by the army and his son, Minūchihr, was raised to the throne. Mahmūd took up the cause of Dārā, another son of Qābūs, who had quarrelled with his father and taken refuge at Ghaznīn. But Minūchihr disarmed his opposition by recognizing him as his suzerain and promising to pay 50,000 dīnārs annually as tribute. A little later Mahmūd married one of his daughters to him. Once, when the fall of Ray created misgivings in his mind, Minūchihr adopted a defiant attitude, but made ample apologies and paid a fine of 500,000 dīnārs to appease his overlord.*

* Z A, 78-79

† They were neither Ghilzais nor Ghûrîds as erroneously supposed by some scholars (See M G, 76, f n 1)

The rulers of Mekrān were the feudatories of the Buwāihids. After the fall of the Buwāihids, one of them, viz., Ma'dān, acknowledged Subuktigīn as his suzerain. On Subuktigīn's death he renewed allegiance to his successor, Mahmūd. On his own death one of his sons, named 'Isā, defeated the other, called Abul Mu'askar, and forced him to seek shelter in Sīstān. Mahmūd was at that time away in India on his expedition against Somnāth. On his return to Ghaznīn when Abul Mu'askar waited upon him, he treated him with kindness. Lest the Sultān should raise Abul Mu'askar to the throne, 'Isā acknowledged Mahmūd as his overlord. He was

-with the rulers of Mekrān

* T Y, 278-80 and 283, and T M, 245-46

then called upon to provide maintenance for his brother and was confirmed in the government of Mekrān. Towards the close of Mahmūd's reign when he was harassed by the Saljūqs, 'Isā declared his independence, which was ensured for some time on account of Mahmūd's death.

On the death of Fakhr-ud-Daulah, the Buwāhid ruler of Rayy, his widow was allowed to govern his dominions as a regent of his minor son, Majd-ud Daulah. Mahmūd

Conquest of Rayy, Hamādān & Isfahān
was too clever to risk his reputation by leading his forces against a defenceless widow. This magnanimity was not, however, extended to her son when he grew to manhood and assumed the reins of kingship on the death of his mother. His reign was a continuous scene of mis-government. Terrorized by the Dailamite troops, he invoked the aid of Sulīān Mahmūd The Sultān, who was waiting for such an opportunity, immediately sent an army under the command of Hājib 'Ali who took him captive and sent him to Ghaznīn, from where he was sent to India. Then followed a ruthless persecution of the Carmāthians, Bātinīs and Mu'tazilites and a wholesale destruction of their literature*. The chiefs of the neighbouring places came forward and owed allegiance to him. But the ruler of Abhar, Sarjahān, Shahrazūr and Zanjānt, named

* See Z A , 91 , K T , ix , 262 , and M G , 83

T For the locality of these places, vide The Lands of the Eastern Caliphate, by G Le Strange, p 221

Ibrāhīm bin Marzubān of Dailam, generally known as "Sālār", had the audacity to incur the displeasure of Mahmūd by refusing to owe allegiance to him. His destruction was therefore decided upon and a large army was sent against him under the command of an old rival of his, called Marzubān bin Hīsāb, who had sought shelter with the Sultan, to punish him for his patriotism. Forming an alliance with some of the leading chiefs of the Dailamites, Marzubān marched against his rival and captured Qazwīn without experiencing much opposition. Meanwhile, Mahmūd returned to his capital and, availing himself of his absence, the Sālār emerged from his retreat, inflicted on his rival a sharp defeat and occupied Qazwīn. Prince Mas'ūd, who was placed in charge of the new province and entrusted with the task of reducing the remaining parts of the Buwayhid territory, opened his régime by leading an expedition against him in conjunction with Marzubān. He laid siege to the stronghold where the Sālār had taken shelter, but the garrison held out heroically and frustrated the efforts of the besiegers. Failing to take the fort by storm, Mas'ūd resorted to underhand means and achieved his object. Holding out high hopes to some of the responsible officers of the Sālār and thus winning them over to his side, he acquainted himself with the vulnerable point of the fort and commenced operations in earnest. Finding himself betrayed by his own officers, the gallant Sālār came out and made a desperate charge on the besiegers. He was, however, defeated and taken prisoner. His son offered submission and promised to pay tribute. Mas'ud next attacked and occupied Hamadān after inflicting a defeat on the deputy of 'Alā-ud-Daulah bin Kākawaih*. The turn of Isfahān came next. 'Alā-ud-Daulah was allowed to retain it at the recommendation of the Khālīfa of Baghdād on the condition that he would pay a sum of 20,000 dīnārs annually as tribute. Meanwhile, Mahmūd breathed his last (30th April, 1030 A.C.) and Mas'ud marched to Nishāpur to make a bid for the throne †.

* His full name was Abu Ja'far Muhammad bin Dushmanziyār and was also known as simply Ibn Kākawaih. The famous philosopher Abū 'Alī Sīnā (Avicenna) flourished at his court under his patronage (K T, ix, 279, and Tārikh-ul-Hukamā, by Al-Qifti, pp 419-26).

† K T, ix, 262-63 and 279, T M, 11-25 and 359, T N, 87. Baihaqī also states that Mas'ud was left at Raiv with an ill-equipped army of only 2,000 (T M, 258).

CHAPTER III

SULTAN MAHMUD THE GREAT—II

HIS INVASIONS OF INDIA

Aiptugīn and his successors had led a number of expeditions against the frontier towns of India and Subuktigīn had fought numerous battles with Rāja Jaipāl of Waikhind (modern Hund) and extended his kingdom as far as Lamghān. It was left for Mahmūd to continue the forward policy of his father and to carry his conquests far into the interior of India. When the Khalifa of Baghdād recognized him as an independent ruler in 999 A.C. 'he made it incumbent upon himself to lead an expedition against India every year'*. In pursuance of this resolution he led not less than seventeen expeditions against India and it must be recorded to his credit that in none of them he suffered a defeat.

* This is what 'Uibī says (T.Y., 154). The translation of this passage in E & D (Vol. II, p. 24) is inaccurate, and it has misled many in that it implies that Mahmūd took a vow to undertake a religious war against Hind every year and casts a halo of Jihād on or rather gives a 'touc' of religious fanaticism to what were purely secular exploits (Vide Chapter IV).

† The accounts of Mahmūd's seventeen (not twelve as erroneously stated by some historians) expeditions against India, as given in the contemporary chronicles and later histories, are materially discrepant. Their number and dates differ in different accounts, the

The first of his Indian expeditions was directed against the frontier towns and forts of the Khyber Pass in the month of September, 1000 A C

(1) Towns of Khyber Pass It resulted in the capture of several places Having entrusted the government of the newly conquered territory to an able officer, Mahmūd returned to Ghaznī with as much booty as he was able to collect *

Jaipāl, the Rāja of Waihind, whom Subuktīgīn had twice defeated and (2) Peshāwar reduced to submission, was no longer friendly Muhammad bin 'Alī, the reputed author of the Majma-ul-Ansāb, informs us that after the death of Amir Subuktīgīn, Rāja Jaipāl tried to win back what spoils obtained by the Sultān in each of them have been variously estimated—in some so exaggerated as to stagger our imagination—and the names of persons and places are too often corrupted, confused and carelessly recorded by the scribes I have exercised the greatest care in reconciling these conflicting and even contradictory accounts and tried to be accurate as far as possible

* Gardīzī is the only contemporary chronicler who makes a mention of this expedition Ferishta and Nizām-ud-din Ahmad are the two later historians who have reproduced it in their works They seem to have drawn upon Gardīzī's Zāin-ul-Akhbār, but both of them have made some mistakes in copying it Sir W Haig (C H I, 111, 13) regards this expedition as 'apocryphal' without assigning any good reasons It was not made much of by the contemporary chroniclers obviously because it was a comparatively minor expedition, confined only to the frontier towns of India

the Amīr had conquered from him and attacked Mahmūd, who set out from Ghaznīn at the head of his army to repel the invasion * The army of the Rāja is said to have consisted of 30,000 foot, 12,000 horse and 300 elephants The two armies encamped in the neighbourhood of Peshāwar and in a fierce fight that took place between them on the 27th of November, 1001 A C , the Hindūs were defeated and put to flight Their Rāja, with fifteen of his sons and grandsons, was made captive and sent to 'a slave market' in Khurāsān and sold there for 80 dinārs,† The spoils were 'beyond

* Majma-ul-Ansāb quoted by Dr M Nāzīm in M G , 87, foot-note 1

† The original word of which the English equivalent is taken to be 'a market' is Man-Yazid, which has puzzled a number of competent scholars On the authority of the MSS of the Taqqāt-i Nāsiri, Raverty assures us that 'nearly every copy' has the word 'Man-Yazid' While translating the relevant passage, Sir H Elliot (E & D , 11, 270) has erroneously written 'Yazd' for 'Man-Yazid' On the authority of the MSS of the Taqqāt-i Nāsiri, Raverty calls it 'Man-Yazid', and relying on the MS of a qasida of 'Unsurī', Dr M Nāzīm calls it Mīrand Both these scholars have taken it to be the name of a place This is perhaps because it is followed by the word Khurāsān in the original text On the authority of the Ghujās-ul Lughāt and the Mūyjād ul-Fuzalā, Professor Hodivala (S I M H , xiii-xiv and 191-93) takes it to mean 'a market, an auction, and an auctioneering room' and, after discussing the point at length, comes to the conclusion that "Jayapāla was publicly exposed at one of the slave auctions in some market in Khurāsān, just like thousands of other Hindū captives" His conclusion is confirmed by Isāmī, the author of the Futūh-us-Salātin, a metrical history of Mediæval India (1000 1349 A C), all bounds of calculation' They included, inter alia, sixteen* precious necklaces of pearls, one of which was of 'enormous value' The Rāja was restored to his kingdom on the conditions that he would pay 250,000 dinars as ransom and give fifty elephants Jaipāl was then allowed to go to his capital, but in order to ensure the fulfilment of the conditions of the peace-treaty, the Sultān detained two princes, a son and a grandson of the Rāja, as hostages After spending the winter months at Waihind and reducing the neighbouring places, Mahmūd returned to Ghaznī in the spring of the same year Humiliated by repeated reverses, the Rāja sank low in the eyes of his subjects 'who refused to written in 1350 A C century and recently lighted upon and published by Dr Mahdi Hussain of Agra The relevant verses are —

فناش همان رانج حیمال دست	پک حمله اوراج مددو شکست
مرو را ناقصانع عربین برد	دلال نارار بردہ سبود
شیدم نعمان درمانرووا	دشتاد دیوار حیمال را
مقیمان نارار نعروختند	هائش بغارن در اندوختند

In view of all this, it is impossible to agree with Dr M Nāzīm who says that "the sale of Jaipāl meant only the fixing of his ransom" (M G, 87) The object of Mahmūd seems to have been to intimidate the Rāja so that he might yield to his demands unconditionally

* Dr M Nāzīm erroneously gives the number of the necklaces captured as 'fifteen' (M G, 87) One necklace, which was of 'enormous value', was taken from the Rāja himself and fifteen from his relatives Hence sixteen is the correct number (T F, 1, 24).

acknowledge a king who had been a captive in the hands of the Muslims' and being fed up with his lot, he solemnly made over his kingdom to his son, Anandpāl, mounted a funeral pyre and burnt himself to death in the customary manner of his proud race *

Bijī Rāī, the Rāja of Bhātiya,† had been on good terms with Subuktigīn
 (3) Bhātiya When, therefore, Mahmūd attacked Jaipāl he expected aid from his father's friend On being disappointed, the Sultān marched against him to punish him 'for his failure to support him' ‡ At his approach the gallant Rāja came out of his fort and offered a pitched battle to the invader The battle raged for three days and the Rāja defended his position very bravely, but on the fourth day a

* T Y , 159, Z A , 56, and T F 1, 24

† See supra, p 11, note Bhera seems to be a more probable identification of Bhātiya, for the capture of Waihind had just 'opened Mahmūd's way into the Northern Punjab' and 'he had not even crossed the Indus', and it is difficult to believe how he could have penetrated as far as Uchch, Bhatinda, Bhatner or Bhāwalpur, which have been offered as identifications of Bhātiya by different scholars Each of the said four places is at a distance of not less than 300 miles from Waihind and it would not have been possible for the Sultān to reach there "without possessing a single base of operations ,any means of keeping up his communications or of preventing the rulers whose territories he had invaded from cutting off his retreat" (See S I-II H , 13S-39)

‡ C H I , m, 14

desperate charge led by the Sultān decided the day in his favour. The Rāja took to flight and found refuge in a fort, which was surrounded by a broad deep ditch. The Sultān laid siege to the fort and ordered that the ditch be filled with earth, stones and trees. The satisfactory progress of this process depressed the spirits of the Rāja who fled to a forest,* leaving the garrison to defend the fort. But he was not safe even there, for his whereabouts were soon discovered and he was pursued to the place where he was sheltering himself. Surrounded by Muslim soldiers on all sides and feeling sure that he would soon be taken prisoner, "the high-spirited" Rāja turned his sword against his own breast and stabbed himself to death†. Desereted by their Chief, the garrison also got depressed and allowed the invader to occupy the fort without facing much opposition. "No quarter was given to the enemy (Hindūs) and only those who embraced Islām escaped the vengeance of the conquerors"‡. Enormous booty, including 120

* T Y, 210 Gardīzī (Z A 67) says that the Rāja fled to the bank of the river Sīsind, "which," according to Dr M Nāzim "might be the old name of the river Hakrī" (M G, 100, n 8) Ferishtā substitutes the word Sind (Indus) for Sāsind (T F, 1, 24).

† T Y, 210, and Z A, 67. It is difficult to reconcile this heroic act of the "high spirited" Rāja with his flight from the fort at the approach of the invader.

‡ M G, 101 Mark the nature of conversion

elephants, fell into the hands of the victors * After the victory the Sultān stayed there for sometime to subjugate the surrounding places During his stay he is said to have "appointed teachers to instruct the converts in the rudiments

* Referring to this booty, Dr M Nāzīm says that "the share of the Sultān alone amounted to 120 elephants besides gold, silver and arms" (M G 101) This statement conveys the impression that there were some more elephants as well, forming the share of others Dr Nāzīm seems to have followed Sir H Elliot who has expressed the same view in a foot-note in E & D, II, 30 which reads "Ferishta says 280 (elephants were captured) and Mirkhond 120, but does not notice that this was the personal share of the Sultān' In view of the well-known fact that in those days all elephants formed the property of the king and no private individual had the right to keep them, it was absurd to point out the personal share of the Sultān Altogether 120 (or 280 according to Gardīzī and Ferishta) elephants were captured and all of them ipso facto belonged to the Sultān Not a single one went to anyone else The words "personal" and "alone" used by Sir H Elliot and Dr Nāzīm respectively are highly misleading Utbī has used the words حُصَنْ اسْلَطَانْ and in the original Arabic text (Delhi Lith., 260) they are not qualified by any such word the equivalent of which may be "personal" or "alone" All that Gardīzī (Z A, 67) says is that 280 elephants were captured In the Newal Kishor edition of the Tārikh-i-Ferishta, Vol I, p 24 the number of elephants captured is دو سو سی و دو، i.e. two times twenty and eighty, which work out to be 120 and not 280, unless سی is taken to be a mistake for سو For the royal prerogative about the keeping of elephants, vide E & D, II, 40, III, 77, 91 92, 120, 235, 316, II, 504, T N (Ravery), 650 note, 662, T M, 349, 488, and T A, 33

of Islam * When he left for Ghaznīn he suffered great losses on the way, in the first place because the Indus was in flood and it exacted a heavy toll, and secondly because Abū Fātch Dād, the ruler of Multān, blocked the passage of his army through his territories and augmented its sufferings † Thus after suffering many hardships and sustaining many losses, the Sultān reached Ghaznīn about the middle of 1005 A.C.

Shaikh Hamid Lawī‡ had cultivated friendly

(4) Multan relations with Amīr Subuktigīn and thus secured his position in Sind and Multān But his grandson, Abū Fātch Dād bin Nasīr, reversed this cautious policy and gave offence to Sultān Mahmūd by embracing the Carmāthian creed, entering

* Ibid., and T.Y., 210 Note that conversion precedes preaching and propaganda

† K.T., ix, 149

‡ Ferishta (T.F., i, 24) has erroneously written 'Lodi' and the error has been repeated by Sir W Haig (C.H.I. iii, 14), Professor M Habib (S.M.G., 23) and others despite the fact that it was fully exploded by Rāerty long ago (Mihran, 325 note) "Lodī" is a miswriting of Liwī who, according to Mas'ūdī, was one of the ancestors of Dīld (V.Z., 234, 385) Mas'ūdī is supported by many other authorities and they all agree that the rulers of Multan were the descendants of one Usama bin Liwī bin Ghālib The Lodīs were Afghans and according to Rāerty, "there were no Lodīs nor Lodī rulers in Multan at this time nor centuries afterwards" (See V.G., 96, foot-note 5, and S.I.U.H., 141)

into an alliance with the Rāja of Bhātiya and attacking the Ghaznawid army on its return-march after the conquest of Bhātiya*. Thus enraged, Sultān Mahmūd set out from Ghaznīn in the spring of 1006 A C and launched his next expedition against the ruler of Multān. The direct route to Multān being risky because it was not safe to cross the Indus lower down, the Sulīān proposed to pass through Anandpāl's territories and cross the river near Peshāwar, but was opposed by the forces of the Rāja. After defeating the Rāja and driving him into the hills of Kashmīr, he resumed his march to Multān. Not willing to court destruction in an open battle, Dāūd shut himself up in the fort and defended his position for a week, after which he sued for peace†. Imposing a tribute of 20,000 golden dīrḥams per year on

* Ferishta simply says that Dāūd had annoyed Mahmūd by his unbecoming behaviour (T F, i, 25).

† According to 'Utbi, he (Dāūd) determined to load all his property on elephants and carry it off to Sarandib, and he left Multān empty" (E & D, ii, 31). This is a most preposterous statement. It has given rise to many surmises and speculations, some of which are no less amazing. Raverty identified Sarandib with Kachh Bhuj (Mīhrān, 325 note). Professor Hodivala suggests the name of "Debal-Sind" and says that it "would appear to be a more plausible restoration" (S I-M H, 141). Dr M Nīzīm says that he (Dāūd) "fled to an island in the Indus" (M G, 97). In view of the fact that the garrison defended the fort for seven days (Z A, 67), the flight of Dāūd is improbable. Had he fled away, the garrison would have submitted without resistance.

Dāūd and exacting promises of future allegiance, good faith and abjuration of heretical beliefs, Mahmūd marched back to Ghaznīn, leaving Sukhpāl, alias Nawāsa Shāh, in charge of the campaign against the outlying parts of Multān.* He would have taken a decisive step against Dāūd and completed the subjugation of the entire province of Multān, but had to content himself with the terms stated above because hardly had he won victory when he received the news of the invasion of his homelands by Ilak Khān, the King of Kāshghar.

Taking advantage of Mahmūd's troubles,
(5) Bhātiya Nawāsa Shāh apostatized and declared himself independent.
Such a conduct on his part was bound to bring

* Dr M Nāzīm, on the authority of Guzīdah (T G, 397) says that Sukhpāl was left in "charge of the government of Multān" (M G, 98) and Sir W Haig says that he was appointed governor of Und (Wāihind) but does not specify his authority (C H I, iii, 15). In view of the fact that a peace was concluded with Dāūd, it is wrong to say that Sukhpāl was entrusted with the government of Multān. Haig seems to have followed Ferishta (T F, i, 25) a little carelessly. All that Ferishta says is that Sukhpāl was left in charge of the campaign against Blatinda (Bhātiya).

† He was a grandson of Rāja Jaipāl, who had been left as a hostage with Subuktigīn and who is said to have been taken prisoner and converted to Islām by Abū 'Alī Sīmjūrī after the defeat of Mahmūd at Nishāpur (Z A, 69). He was called Nawās Shāh because he was the Nawāsa (grandson) of the Shāh (Jaipāl of the Hindūshāhiya Dynasty).

on him the usual punishment. The danger from Kāshghar being over, Mahmūd advanced at the head of his army early in the year 1008 A.C. and attacked him. Nawāsa Shāh was defeated, dispossessed of 400,000 dirhams, which he had accumulated, and thrown into prison for the rest of his life.*

Anandpāl, who had allied himself with
 (6) Punjāb Dāūd, the ruler of Multān, and blocked the passage of the Muslim army through his territory, now sent ambassadors on all sides and invoked the assistance of the neighbouring princes of Hindustān for stemming the rising tide of the Muslim conquest. Among those who readily responded to his request were the Rājas of Ujjain, Gwālior, Kālinjar, Kanauj, Delhi and Ajmer, all of whom joined him in his invasion of the Ghaznawid Kingdom. This was the first Hindū confederacy formed against Mahmūd and to overthrow it was no easy task †. Trilochan-pāl, ‡ son of Anandpāl, was entrusted with the

* Z A, 69, T Y, 223, and T F, 1, 26.

† Firishta alone is responsible for making a mention of this confederacy (T F, 1, 26). In the list of the confederates he includes the Rājas of Delhi and Ajmer as well, but it is contended that Delhi and Ajmer were not founded at that time. (See M G., 89, foot-note 3, and Iranian Antiquary, xxvi, 162.)

‡ Dr M. Nazīm, following 'Utbī (E & D n 33) calls him Brahmanpāl, which is an error (See S. H., 133).

command of the combined forces of the Rājas and directed to advance towards Peshāwar. These forces were further swelled on the way by the enlistment of 'the wild and warlike' Gakhars So great was the national excitement among the Hindūs on this occasion that they spared nothing to destroy the neighbouring Muslim kingdom root and branch Those who were poor gave ample proof of their patriotism by contributing as much as they could from their meagre earnings Even their women are said to have sold their jewellery and gold ornaments in order to augment the resources of war On receiving the news of this Hindū invasion, Mahmūd marched out on the 31st of December, 1008 A C, crossed the Indus and reached the plain opposite Waihind This time Mahmūd observed that unlike before the Hindūs had sunk their differences and pooled their resources for national defence He was highly impressed by the devotion of the Hindūs and their women When the battle began, the bare-headed and bare-footed Gakhars, armed with spears and swords, appeared on the scene, rushed into the thick of the fight and killed a large number of Muslims The prudence and personal prowess of the Sultān, coupled with a piece of good luck, turned the tables against the Hindūs When the fury of the Hindū attack abated and the Hindūs were exhausted, the Argus-eyed Mahmūd sent his personal guards to sweep round and make a sudden attack on the rear of the Hindū army This was done and, while effecting a partial change of front to repulse the attack, the Hindū ranks ran riot and in a state of confusion they took to flight Mahmūd won the day and a large amount of booty, including thirty elephants, fell into his hands The dispersal of the Hindū hordes opened the way for further penetration by revealing the weakness of the Indian military system

Mahmūd next marched to the fort of Nagarkot, situated near Kangri on the summit of a hill and surrounded by the river Baganga The fort was a place of great sanctity, because it had a temple, which stood high in the estimation of the people and enjoyed a wide reputation as the repository of most of the wealth of the neighbouring Rajas Mahmūd laid siege to it and the garrison surrendered it after three days 'heroic defence' The spoils obtained were 'beyond the limit of calculation' Among other precious things, they included a vast amount of gold and silver ingot, costly apparel, a profusely decorated throne and a house of silver* Even after making considerable allowance for exaggeration, the fact cannot escape recognition that the spoils were colossal, so much so that envoys from different countries flocked to

* 'Ulbī has given a graphic description of this 'house of silver' From it we can safely infer that it was a folding pavilion made of silver, chiefly meant for use in royal journeys and progresses It was not a silver throne as 'Unsuri would have us believe (See S I M H, 143)

Ghaznīn when that wealth was being displayed there Placing the fort in charge of his own officers, the Sultān returned to Ghaznīn in the middle of the year 1009 A C After his departure Anandpāl managed to re-establish his sway in the Salt Range, with Nandāna as his capital

In 1009 A C. Mahmūd invaded India again

(7) Narāvan This time he attacked Narāyan or
Narāyanpur* and inflicted a stunning defeat on its Rāja After capturing and plundering the town, he returned to his capital Some time later the agents of the Rāja waited upon him with proposals of a permanent peace and 'their good wishes for his future prosperity' According to the terms of the peace-treaty that was then concluded, the Rāja offered to pay a yearly tribute and fifty elephants and to send 2,000 soldiers to serve in the Ghaznavid army Mahmūd was pleased to accept these terms The peace is believed to have given a great encouragement to trade between India and Khurāsān Politically, this expedition opened the way to the heart of Hindūstān and the Sultān could now march through Narāyanpur and attack the Rājas beyond

* Cunningham identified it with Narāyanpur in Alwar State (See his Ancient Geography, pp 338-44, and ASI, Vol ii, pp 242-47 and Vol vi, pp 91-93) Of all the contemporary chroniclers, 'Utbi alone has mentioned this expedition in his book He does not give the date but places it between the expeditions to Bhīmnagar (Nagarkot) and Ghūr

Taking advantage of the invasion of Khurāsān

(8) Multān by Ilak Khān and of Mahmūd's absence, Abul Fateh Dāūd, the ruler of Multān, renounced allegiance to the Sultān and declared his independence. Mahmūd's next expedition was, therefore, directed against him. It was undertaken in October, 1010 A C. This time Dāūd was taken prisoner and sent to Ghaznīn and confined in the fort of Ghūrak.* Multān was completely subjugated and annexed to Ghaznīn. After appointing a governor there, Mahmūd marched back to Ghaznīn.

In 1012 A C Mahmūd proposed to march from Ghaznīn with the object of (9) Thānesar capturing Thānesar, which was then one of the most famous shrines of India, renowned for the age-long riches accumulated in its vaults. On learning of his intention, Anandpāl sent his men to Ghaznīn to request Mahmūd to take fifty elephants from him every year and impose an annual tribute on the people of that place.

* 'Ghūrak or Ghorak (جھرک) is situated about fifty miles north-west of Qandhār' (M G, 99, n 3). In the Tārikh-i-Ferishta (i, 27) it is written as جھرک. It appears that ج has been left out by the scribe, for Ghūr was conquered a year later (1011 A C).

† Dr. Nāzīm calls him Trilochanpāl, which is wrong, because 'the Thānesar campaign was undertaken during the life of Anandpāl (S M G, 32, n 14 and T F, i, 27) Sir W Haig erroneously calls him Jaipāl II (C H I, iii, 17-18).

and spare it because it had an idol called Chakraswāmin,^{*} to which the Hindūs were so devoutly attached. The Sultān declined the offer and ordered the Rāja to allow full and free passage to his forces through his territory. The Rāja could not but obey, but at the same time he warned the Rāja of Thānesar about the impending danger. On receipt of this timely information the Rāja of Thānesar sought and secured the support of the neighbouring princes. But before the clumsy machinery of the Indian confederacy could move, Mahmūd marched through the Punjāb, defeated on the way a Rāja called Ram, who opposed his advance near the Sutlej, and reached Thānesar. At his approach, the Rāja took to flight, leaving the Chakraswāmin to take care of itself. The invader entered the town without encountering opposition, because it was found in an undefended position. A vast booty, together with a large number of captives and the idol Chakraswāmin, was transported to Ghaznīn †

* T. F., i, 27. Chakraswāmin means "The Lord of the Wheel". It was a bronze image of Vishṇu, which held the weapon, called Chakra, in one of its hands (See Sachao, i, 117, and Z. A., 70)

† Utbī places the invasion of Thānesar after that of Nandana. He does not give the date and therefore seems to have made a mistake. Elliot follows him in the error to mislead many others, including Dr M. Nāzīm (M. G., 91 and 103) and Sir W. Haig (C. H. I., iii, 17). The expedition against Thānesar was undertaken during the lifetime of Anandpal and therefore the one against Nandana, which

Trilochanpāl,* the Rāja of Nandana,† "was personally well inclined towards (10) Nandana. the Mussalmāns, but he seems to have been a weak man and the direction of affairs came into the hands of his son, known to contemporaries as the 'Nīdar' (Fearless) Bhīm, who stoutly reversed the policy of his grandfather and put an end to the Ghaznavid alliance"‡ In order to keep his way clear to India, Mahmūd marched against Nandana in the autumn of 1013 A C but abandoned the expedition owing to a heavy snow-fall In the following spring (1014 A C) the Ghaznawids set out again, "ascending the hills like mountain-goats and descending them like torrents of water" On hearing of Mahmūd's advance, Trilochanpāl entrusted the defence of the fort to his son, Bhīmpāl, and himself retired to the Kashmīr Pass, presumably with the object of enlisting the support of Sangramārāja, the ruler of Kashmīr On his arrival, Mahmūd laid siege to the fort and, after some days' futile fighting, succeeded in drawing out a detachment of Bhīmpāl into the plain and putting it to the

was directed against his son, could not have preceded it Gardīzī (Z A , 70) places it in 1011–12 A C , which seems to be correct Ferishta adheres to the correct order (T F , 1, 27-28) I have followed Gardīzī and Ferishta.

* Sir W Haig (C H I , iii, 17) calls him Jaipāl II which is wrong

† It is called Nardīn by 'Utbī and Nandūnah by Baīhaqī and Gardīzī It is situated in the Salt-Range

‡ See S M G , 34

sword On receipt of fresh reinforcements, Bhīmpāl appeared in the plain and attacked the invaders, but was beaten back The Hindūs took to flight to find refuge in the fort of Nandana The fort was besieged and the garrison sought safety in submission After placing a garrison in Nandana, Mahmūd pushed on in pursuit of Trīlochanpāl, defeated him in a valley to the north of Jhelum and received the submission of "numerous Rājas of the neighbourhood" Leaving Sārūgh as governor of Nandana and possessing himself of immense booty, Mahmūd returned to Ghaznīn

In 1015 A C the Sultān started from Ghaznīn at the head of his army and proposed to penetrate into Kashmīr, probably with the object of punishing Sangramārāja for helping Trīlochanpāl He, however, failed to storm the fort of Lohkot * After reducing the neighbouring regions, he abandoned the enterprise and returned On his way back his soldiers lost their way, with the result that many of them perished in the extensive morasses that blocked their passage This expedition against Kashmīr was followed by another in 1021 A. C , but that too suffered the fate of its predecessor and the Sultān finally gave up the idea of conquering Kashmīr †

* Kalhāna and Gardīzī call it Lohkot and Lohārkotta respectively Both these names mean 'The Iron Fort' It is identified with modern Loharīn (M G , 104. f n 6)

† Z A , 79

The twelfth expedition was undertaken with a view to penetrate right into the

(12) Baran interior of the Indian Continent
In 1018 A C the Sultān set out at the head of a huge army, recruited chiefly from Central Asia. Passing through the Punjāb, crossing the Jumna and capturing all the forts and fortified places, including Sirsāwa,* that blocked his passage, he reached Baran (modern Bulandshehr), whose governor, Hara Datta, tendered submission and embraced Islām along with his 10,000 men. From there Mahmūd marched to Mahāban,† situated in the Muttra District (U P), whose chief, Kul Chand,‡ also submitted without offering any

* For the origin and antiquity of Sirsāwa, see A S I, viii, 79

† Gardīzī calls it Mahāwan and 'Unsurī calls it Mahāwin. It is situated six miles east of Muttra on the left bank of the Jumna. (See S I-M H, 146)

‡ Kul Chand is said to have been only a 'governor' of the fort (C H I, iii, 19). This is incorrect. 'Utbi's reference to him that he was "a Satanic leader, who had assumed superiority over all other rulers, defeated, put to flight everyone he had fought with and possessed a great army, numerous elephants and strong forts which were secure from attack and capture" militates against the theory that he was but a 'governor' and conclusively shows that he was one of the greatest and strongest rulers of his day—a conclusion which is also confirmed by the fact that in the battle he fought with Mahmūd as many as 50,000 of his soldiers were slain and not less than 150 of his elephants were captured after his defeat. Ferishta (T F, i, 29) calls him a Rāja. Professor Hodivala suggests that Kul Chand was none other than Kalla Chid (See S I-M H, 146 47)

pure gold,* he proceeded towards Kanauj, a great citadel of Hindūstān, and appeared before its walls early in 1019 A C. The descriptions of the grandeur of the city and of the splendour of its Court, as given by Hindū and Muslim chroniclers, stagger our belief. It contained seven forts and ten thousand temples. Its army consisted of eighty-thousand men in armour, thirty-thousand horsemen and five hundred thousand infantry. Notwithstanding this overwhelming strength at his disposal, Rājyapāl's† heart melted after a short and feeble resistance and he sought safety in flight. Mahmūd entered the seven forts, and seized the wealth treasured there.

After the capture of Kanauj Mahmūd marched to Munj,‡ a strongly garrisoned fort, well-

* Sir W Haig's estimate of the gold yielded by these idols is 548 lbs (C H I, iii, 19) This again is without authority. Utbi informs us that it was 98,300 misqāls i.e., 1010 lbs Avordupois (See S I-M H, 149)

† He is called Jai Chand by Sir W Haig (C H I, iii, 19) Professor Hodivala dismisses it as 'wrong' and calls him Rājyapāl. He supports his contention by citing evidence from inscriptions etc (S I-M H, 149) Utbi calls him Rājpāl

‡ Elliot identified this place with Majhāwan, some ten miles south of Kānpur or Cawnpore (E & D, ii, 458) Dr Vost was of opinion that it corresponded to Manach, which is said to have been the old name of the modern town of Zafarābād, situated near Jaunpur (J R A S, 1905) His hypothesis is followed by Sir W Haig in The Cambridge History of India (Vol iii, p 20) Dr M Nāzīm differs from them and, while stating that Mahmūd

left it to the mercy of the invader and gone into a forest with his army and treasure Mahmūd pursued him thither, defeated him and dispossessed him of his wealth This was the crowning exploit of a most laborious campaign, after which Mahmūd returned to Ghaznī with enormous wealth and a large number of captives

The cowardly conduct of Rājyapāl, the
 (13) Kanauj Rāja of Kanauj, earned him the
 and Kālinjar enmity of the neighbouring Rājas who formed a league against him with Ganda,* the Chandela Rāja of Kālinjar, as their head. The allied forces were put under the command of the Chandela crown-prince, Vīdhyaḍhāra, and sent against Rājyapāl of Kanauj to punish him for his pusillanimity. Rājyapāl was killed in battle and probably his son, Trilochandāl,† was placed on the vacant throne.Flushed with this victory, Ganda entered into an alliance with Trilochanpāl, son of Anandpāl, and promised to help him 'in winning back his ancestral kingdom from Sultān Mahmūd'.‡ On receipt of information about these events, Mahmūd made up his mind to march against the Chandela prince and his

* Some historians call him Nanda, but Ganda is the correct name

† He is said to have been a son of Rājyapāl (O H I, 383)

‡ Z A, 76, and K T, iv, 218

accomplishes and to teach them a lesson. In the autumn of 1019 A.C. he left Ghaznīn with a firm determination to retaliate the assassination of his vassal, Rājyapāl, and to deal a death-blow to the league that had been formed against him and was now contemplating to overthrow the Ghaznavid power in the Punjab. On hearing of his approach, Trilochanpāl of Lahore proceeded south to join forces with his namesake of Kanauj. Mahmūd pursued him post-haste and overtook him near the river Ruhut.* The Rāja managed to cross the river and sent a detachment to prevent the enemy from crossing it. Encouraged by their leader's promise of "a life of repose after that day of trouble", the Muslims plunged into the river and landed on the other side of it 'without the loss of a single life'. Marshalling his forces in battle array Mahmūd inflicted a sharp defeat on his opponents and obtained enormous booty, including many elephants. The Rāja, though wounded in the battle, managed to escape and sought shelter with the Chindela Rāja of Kālinjar. The turn of Ganda therefore came next. He was awaiting the invader with a huge army, consisting of 36,000 horse, 145,000 foot and 640 elephants. Ascending an eminence with a view to reconnoitre the position of the Hindū army, Mahmūd saw 'an imposing panorama of camps, pavilions and embankments and he regretted

* The river Jamganga is known as Ruhut (Rāhib) in its lower course. (I.G.I., xxi, 175)

having ventured so far' In this hour of distress and disappointment he prostrated himself on the ground and sought divine aid, which never failed him In the evening the Muslims fought a successful engagement with a detachment of the Rāja and in the morning they were told that the Hindūs had deserted the camp Stricken with panic, the Rāja seems to have taken to flight in the guise of night All the valuables, which the Hindūs had left behind, were taken possession of and the Rāja was pursued to some distance, but he managed to make good his escape, though many of his men were captured or killed Thereafter, Mahmūd marched back to Ghaznī On the way 580 elephants, belonging to Ganda, happened to fall into his hands *

The opposition of Trilochanpāl, the Rāja of Lāhore, to the forces of Sultān
 (14) Punjāb Mahmūd in the expedition against Kalinjar furnished a good ground for invading his kingdom In 1021 A C Mahmūd appeared in India again and inflicted a crushing defeat on Bhīmpāl who had succeeded his father, Trilochanpāl, in the meantime The Rāja took shelter with the ruler of Ajmer and died there in 1026 A C †

* Z A , 77

† T F , i, 31 Dr M Nāzīm (V G , 96, n 1) does not seem to be justified in criticising Sir W Haig's statement that "he (Bhīmpāl) fled and sought an asylum with the Chuhān rāja of Ajmer" (C H I , iii, 22) He is, however, right in saying that Bhīmpāl succeeded to the diminished dominions of his father and died in 1026

With him the Hindūshāhiya Dynasty came to an end. The results of this expedition were more enduring than those of others. The Punjab was cleared and annexed to the Ghaznawid Empire. A regular Amīr was entrusted with the government of the province with his head-quarters at Lāhore, and garrisons were stationed at important places.

Next year Mahmūd marched against Ganda who was still strong enough to defy (15) Gwālior and Kālinjar the authority of the Sultān. He first laid siege to and stormed the 'impregnable' fort of Gwālior, and after receiving the submission of its chief, called Arjan, who was a feudatory of Ganda, he proceeded towards Kālinjar, the stronghold of the Chandela Rāja, and surrounded it on all sides, so that all approaches to the fort were closed. Finding himself in a perilous situation, Ganda purchased safety by offering submission without resistance. Having obtained enormous amount of wealth, Mahmūd concluded a peace-treaty with the Rāja and went back to Ghaznī, laden with riches. Both Ferishta and Nizām-ud-Dīn Ahmad say that, in order to please the Sultān, the Rāja composed a flattering verse in Hīndī and sent it to his over-lord who, in return, rewarded him with a robe of honour and conferred upon him the government of as many as fifteen fortresses *

A C (M G, 95-96) In his presence, however insignificant his power might have been, a Muslim governor of the Punjab would not have been appointed

The crowning achievement of Sultān Mahmūd
 (16) Somnāth was indeed the sack of Somnāth in Kathiāwār (1025-26 A C) †
 The shrine of Somnāth‡ was the most celebrated,
 the most opulent and the most revered on the Continent of India "The wealth and importance of the shrine," says Sir W Haig "far exceeded those of any temple which he had yet attacked One thousand Brahmans daily attended the temple, three hundred and fifty of the unfortunate women whom the Hindūs dedicate nominally to the service of their gods and actually to the appetites of their priests danced continually before the idol, which was a huge lingam or phallus These priests and attendants

* Both these authorities seem to have drawn upon
 Gardīzī (Z A , 80)

† Ibn-ul-Asīr (K T , 11, 241-42), Ibn Zafir (M G , 115), Sibt-ul-Jawzī (M G , 115), Alberūnī (Sachao, 11, 9 & 103), Gardīzī (Z A , 86-87), Nizām-ud-Dīn Ahmad (T A , 9) and Khwāndmīr (E & D 11, 180) place this expedition in the year 1025-26 A C While translating the relevant passage of K T in E & D , (Vol 11, p 469), Elliot has carelessly recorded 414 A H for 416 A H This is an 'inadvertent error,' which has misled all those who have drawn upon E & D Ferishta has recorded 415 A H as the year of this expedition (T F , 11, 32), but his evidence cannot outweigh that of the original authorities quoted above Mark the
 mistake repeated by Sir W Haig (C H I , III, 23), M Elphinstone (H I , 334), and Sm ' ' H I , 193), who have blindly followed Ferishta and

‡ For its site etc , see M G , 2

were supported from the endowments of the temple, which are said to have consisted of the revenues of 10,000 villages, the idol was washed daily with water brought from the Ganges, 750 miles distant, and the jewels of the temple were famed throughout the length and breadth of India ".* The object of Mahmūd in undertaking this arduous expedition is thus expressed by Allāma Kāmil Ibn-ul-Asīr —

" When Yamīn-ud-Daulah (Mahmūd) was gaining victories and demolishing temples in India, the Hindus said that Somnāth (a Hindu god) was displeased with these idols and that if he had been satisfied with them, no one would have destroyed or injured them. When Yamīn-ud-Daulah heard this, he resolved upon making a campaign to destroy this idol, believing that when the Hindus saw their prayers and imprecations to be false and futile they would embrace the faith "†

Allāma Ibn Khaldūn also assigns almost the same motive to the expedition against Somnāth. He says —

" Before this whenever Sultān Mahmūd stormed a fort or destroyed an idol, Hindus would say that Somnāth was annoyed with it and therefore allowed it to be destroyed, otherwise he would have killed Mahmūd much earlier

* C H I , iii, 23

† K T , ix, 241

From some source Mahmūd received this information and with a view to extirpate idolatry, to prove the helplessness of man-made gods and to belie the claims of the Hindūs, he mobilized his forces against Somnāth"

Ferishta also strikes the same note † Sir W Haig follows these authorities and thus expresses Mahmūd's motive in The Cambridge History of India —

"The Brahmins attached to this famous shrine boasted that their master Shiva, the moon-lord, was the most powerful of all the gods and that it was only owing to his displeasure with other gods that the invader had been permitted to plunder and pollute their shrines. This provocative vaunt suggested to Mahmūd the destruction of the temple of Somnāth as the readiest means to a wholesale conversion of idolaters"‡

In other words, the object underlying the expedition against Somnāth was to disillusion the Hindūs and thus bring them within the fold of Islām. How far Mahmūd was moved by religious and how far by politico-economic motives in invading India time and again is a matter of controversy which has been dealt with

* I K, II, vii, 245,

† T F, i, 32

‡ C H I, iii, 23

in a separate chapter * It may, however, be noted here that the motive assigned by the aforesaid historians to the Somnāth expedition is unwarranted in-as-much as the object of the expedition, if it was really to effect a wholesale conversion of Hindūs, was not achieved, nor did Mahmūd try to achieve it even after a complete conquest of the place, though there is no doubt that this expedition, like others, was understood as a Jihād by the common people

On the 18th of October, 1025 A C, Mahmūd started from Ghaznīn and reached Multān on the 9th of the following November. There he took some rest and put his forces in order. Leaving Multān on the 26th of the same month, he passed through the desert, stormed the strong fort of Lodorva,† that fell on his way, and reached Anhilwāra about the end of December, 1025 A C At his approach Bhīmdeva, the Rāja of Anhilwāra, fled to the fort of Kandahat,‡ situated in the neighbourhood Mahmūd took

* See Chapter IV infra

† M G , 218

‡ The situation of this fort, which is also written as Khandama, Khandabā, Kandana, Khandana, etc , has taxed the ingenuity of a number of scholars who have indentified it with Kanthkot in Vāgad (East Cutch), Gāndhavi on the Kāthiāwār coast, Gandhār to the north of the Dhadar river, Khandadhar to the north-east angle of Kāthiāwār, and Kanbāhat or Cambay, which bear some phonetic resemblance to it, but none except Kanbāhat (Cambay), which answers well to the description given of it by Ibn-ul-Asīr, seems to be correct (See S I-M. H , 187-88)

possession of the town and then resumed his march to Somnāth Defeating an army of 20,000 Hindus at Mundher (or Mudhera) and overrunning Delvāda near Una on his way, he took his stand before the very gates of the famous shrine on the 6th of January, 1026 A C^{*} He invested the fortress, which was situated on the seashore and washed by the waves The commander of the fort took to flight and the garrison did not stir out to meet the invaders, believing that their god, "the mighty Someshwar," would completely annihilate the "impious assailants" The Hindus, who had climbed the ramparts to see the besiegers, shouted to the Musalmāns that their god had drawn them to that place in order to destroy them at one blow for the idols they had broken in Hindūstān On the morning of the 7th of January, which was Friday, the fight began and before the time of Juma' prayer the defenders were overthrown by a deadly fusillade of arrows The Musalmāns escaladed the walls of the fort and proclaimed their victory by chanting a call for Juma' prayer The Hindus then entered the temple, prayed fervently to the idol for their success and sallied forth for fighting They delivered a most desperate attack on their enemy and dislodged them from their newly occupied position Next morning (Saturday) Mahmūd renewed the attack with such vigour that the Hindus were driven back to the doors

* For Mundher and Delvāda, see M G , 215 ff

of the shrine, where a most terrible drama of bloodshed was enacted, so that 'few were left alive' Meanwhile, the neighbouring princes hastened to the rescue of the shrine and on the morning of the following day Mahmūd found his camp surrounded by hostile forces, which were constantly strengthened by fresh reinforcements An irretrievable disaster seemed to be in store for Musalmāns and Mahmūd's position was extremely critical As usual, the Sultān bowed down before Allah in all humility quite as fervently as the Hindūs knelt before the arch-idol, invoking assistance Then rising up and springing into his saddle, as if inspired, he cheered up his soldiers and exhorted them to action with the usual battle-cry of Allah o Akbar. The exhortation had the desired effect, for the Muslims made a most desperate attack, broke through the ranks of the Hindū army and threw it into confusion This victory decided the fate of Somnāth, for thereafter the panic-stricken garrison offered no resistance Mahmūd entered the temple to reap the fruits of his victory Never perhaps were his labours more materially rewarded The idol of Somnāth was broken and the temple was divested of its wealth After a stay of about fifteen days, Mahmūd left for Ghaznīn The Rājas of Rājpūtāna, who had been taken unawares by Mahmūd's march through their country, were now advancing under

* For the legend relating to the breaking of this idol by Mahmūd, vide Chapter VI

Virama or Viryārāma Deva* of Sambhar to block his passage Avoiding conflict with them, as he did not wish to risk the spoils he had with him, he took a more westerly route and wished to reach Multān through the desert of Sind He marched northwards till he reached a shallow arm of the sea running between Cutch and Kathiawār With the aid of native guides, who pointed out the passage to him, he led his forces across the channel This heroic move on his part struck terror into the heart of the Rāja of Anhilwāra who had fled to the fort of Kandahat at the approach of the Muslim army The Rāja again 'fled from the fortress in mean disguise leaving it at the mercy of the invader who occupied it and captured a number of prisoners After that Mahmūd resumed his return-march, and proceeded across Cutch It was there that he was led astray by a Hindū devotee of Somnāth who had offered to act as his guide Extricating himself from this perilous situation, he safely crossed over to Sind and then marched to Mansūra, whose ruler took to flight While marching along the Indus towards Multān, Mahmūd and his followers

* Dr M Nāzim (V G, 119) calls him Parmadeva of Abū, which is a mistake (See S I-V H, 237) Sir W Haig (C H I, iii, 25) has cautiously omitted his name and merely stated that he was the Rāja of Sambhar Ferishta (T F, i, 34) states that he was the Rāja of Ajmer, but Ajmer was not founded till then ī Farrukhī calls him Khafīf He was a Carmāthian (See M G, 120)

suffered much at the hands of the Jāts who inhabited that part of the country. It was with great difficulty that the Sultān reached Ghaznī on the 2nd of April, 1026 A.C.

"The expedition to Somnāth," says Dr M. Nāzim, "is one of the greatest feats of military adventure in the history of Islām. The news of this victory sent a wave of joy all over the Muslim world, and the Caliph heaped titles and honours on the Sultān, his sons and his brother." Like many other heroes, Sultān Mahmūd became transformed into an almost mythical figure and generations of enthusiastic authors surrounded his name with a huge literature of fanciful stories which were intended to glorify him as a king and a warrior. The idol of Somnāth itself perished but it immortalized the name of Sultān Mahmūd."

The last of Mahmūd's Indian expeditions

* On his return from Somnāth the Sultān received complimentary and congratulatory letters from Al-Qādir Billah, the Khalīfa of Baghdād, conferring upon him the title of Kalif-ud-Daulah wal Islām and upon his sons, Mas'ud and Amīr Muhammad, those of Shahāb-ud-Daulah wa Jamāl-ul-Millah and Jalāl ud-Daulah wa Jamāl-ul-Millah respectively and upon his brother, Yūsuf, that of Azud-ud-Daulah wa Mu'ayyid-ul-Millah, as well as recognising the Sultān as the ruler of Khurāsān, Hindūstān, Sistān, Nīmrūz and Khwārizm, and empowering him to nominate his successor.

† For some of these stories, see Chapter VI. Also see 'Awfi's Jawāmi ul Hikāyat, Attār's Kulliyāt, Senāl's Hadiqah, etc.

was directed against the Jāts* who had wantonly molested his army on its return
 (17) Islands of the Indus from Somnāth It was undertaken in the spring of 1027 A C

At the approach of the invader, the Jāts took refuge in an island, enclosed by the smaller channels of the Indus, which could not be waded across and from where they could escape from one island to another in the hour of need Mahmūd was quite on guard against this expediency and had therefore prepared a fleet of 1,400 boats, each of which was armed with three ironspikes—one in front and one on either side Each of these boats carried twenty men armed with bows, arrows, hand-grenades and naptha-balls This fleet was launched on the Indus against the Jāts, who too had made ample preparations and brought a flotilla of 4000† boats, properly manned and equipped When, however, the action began, it is stated, the boats of the Jāts were broken and capsized by the ironspikes with which the boats of their opponents were provided ‡ The victors then landed on the islands, where the Jāts had kept their families for safety, and captured a large booty.

* Alberūnī informs us that the Jāts were the worshippers of linga or phallus (Sachao, II, 104) They were not the inhabitants of the Salt Range in the Punjab, as alleged by some They were the Bhatis of Bhatner who had migrated to Sind (Burgess A S W I, II, 193)

† According to another account, their number was 8000, which seems to be an exaggeration

‡ How this could be possible puts a strain on our credulity

CHAPTER IV

SULTAN MAHMUD THE GREAT—III

MOTIVES AND RESULTS OF INDIAN INVASIONS

What were the aims and objects of Sultān Mahmūd in leading so many expeditions to India and what were the results and effects of those expeditions? This is a question which has been asked and answered too often and while answering which historians have expressed different views, almost all of which are, however, based on a superficial study of Sultān Mahmūd's life and character and of the history of his times. We shall deal first with his motives and then with the results of his invasions of India in order to show how far the motives are justified by the results.

Introductory

As regards the motives, there are at present three distinctive schools of thought.

MOTIVES According to one school, Mahmūd was a raider-in-chief who, in order to satisfy his greed for gold, "came, burnt, killed, plundered, captured and went." According to another school, he was "one of the greatest champions of Islām," whose principal aim in invading India was to extirpate idolatry and to propagate Islām at the point of the sword. The third school simply sidetracks by saying that "Mahmūd's character was complex" and it is nothing short of a wild goose chase to try to ascertain the inspiring motive. The task is not so difficult as it seems to be at first sight, but in order to arrive at correct conclusions it is necessary to dive deep into the history of his reign and to find out the factors that were directly responsible for his invasions of India. For the sake of clarity and convenience these factors may be studied under the following heads, viz., (1) Political, (2) Economic, and (3) Religious.

Political Factors

Among the political factors that were responsible for Mahmūd's wars in India the following will be found to be the most conspicuous. The first was the non-fulfilment or rather deliberate violation of the terms of the peace-treaty solemnly concluded by Rāja Jaipāl of Lāhore with Amīr Subuktigīn of Ghaznīn after suffering a crushing defeat in a battle in which he himself was the 'aggressor' *. The second was the invasion of Ghaznīn by Jaipāl with a view to win back what Subuktigīn had conquered from him †.

* In the words of Dr Ishwara Topa "The first campaign against India was undertaken in order to effect the recognition of political obligations and to enforce the political supremacy with a view to raising the status and prestige of the Ghaznavide power in the eyes of the Indian Rāja." (Politics in Pre-Mughal Times, 33)

† See supra, pp 50-51. In view of Rāja Jaipāl's previous conduct and breach of faith, etc., I have absolutely no hesitation to believe the statement in the Majma-ul-Ansāb, in which he is shown as the aggressor. Since

The third was the breach of faith on the part of Indian Rājas who, after entering into alliance with the Sultān, betrayed him. It will be remembered that at times Mahmūd contracted friendly relations with Indian Rājas, 'binding them under political obligations'. When these 'obligations' were cast to the corner or broken, he declared war against them and punished them for their betrayal. The fourth was the renouncing of allegiance to the Sultān and the withholding of tributes promised to him by Indian Rājas. When defeated, Indian Rājas owed allegiance to him and agreed to pay him tribute annually. When the promised tribute was withheld and allegiance renounced, Mahmūd marched against them to punish them for their insubordination and to maintain his own political supremacy. The fifth was political betrayal in the form of help given to the enemies of the Sultān. Often Mahmūd's Hindū allies colluded with his enemies and plotted to overthrow him in league with them. This was no less responsible his defeat by Subuktigīn for the second time he must have been anxious to retrieve his reputation and to wipe off the stigma of repeated reverses and humiliation. The death of Amīr Subuktigīn supplied him with the long-sought-for opportunity and he must have invaded Ghaznin to achieve his object—to overthrow the Ghaznawid power and thus maintain his dignity among the Hindū Rājas and his own subjects. His son and successor, Anandpāl, also enacted the same role soon after his accession. He formed a formidable confederacy for the invasion of Ghaznin and tried to do what his father could not. See supra, pp 59 ff.

for spurring him to take drastic actions against them and to pounce upon their States. The sixth was the molestation of the Sultān's Indian allies by their hostile neighbours. Whenever any Hindū Rājas turned against his allies and attacked them with a view to deprive them of their political power for the simple reason that they owed allegiance to the Ghaznawid Sultān, he had to come to their aid because regard for political obligations and respect for pledges given compelled him to do so. The seventh was the rebellion of his Indian vassals. Defiance of his authority in India by the Rājas of Indian States, who acknowledged his suzerainty, also led him to invade India for suppressing their rebellions and re-establishing his authority.*

Economic,— The economic factors were quite as strong and stimulating as political. The importance of wealth as a means of attaining political power and retaining it is too evident to be dealt with in detail. Suffice it to say that Mahmūd understood the importance and appreciated the miraculous powers of wealth. He knew that it was the very source of political strength and stability and was therefore keen on possessing as much of it as possible. India's fabulous wealth must have stirred his soul and stimulated his ambitions and

* These causes have been brought out at their places in Chapter III and here they are just referred to in order to facilitate the discussion.

THE GHAZNAWIDS

influenced his course of action. The unbroken series of victories won in India brought in their train a regular downpour of wealth which immensely augmented the Ghaznawid Treasury. The wealth thus acquired was used for the cultural as well as political advancement of the State, and this was mainly responsible for the glory that was Ghaznīn and the might that was Mahmūd. It had no mean share in establishing his authority in his kingdom and his superiority over the kings of the Islamic world in general and of the Indian world in particular. It enhanced the reputation of Ghaznīn all over the world as a centre of power, as a source of light and as a seat of learning and culture. The wealth in his possession must have, moreover, served as a sure bait for the mercenaries who, unless and until they were given enough of it as a reward for their services, would not have accompanied him to his distant expeditions. To finance his schemes successfully, he stood in need of money and India was a veritable El Dorado.*

Before dealing with the religious factors Religious, — which might have served as causes of the Ghaznawid invasions of India, it is necessary to know the tone of Muslim religious life in Mahmūd's times, for he was, after all, a product of his own environments and his actions must have been influenced by the ethical standards then in vogue. A reference, however brief, to the Qurānic conception of State is quite apropos of the subject. The method of government contemplated by the Qur-ān and recommended by the Prophet is theocracy, i.e., a system of social and political control founded on divine laws and sanctions, reflecting the will of God in all its forms and phases, motives and movements. The idea is to Islāmize life in accordance with the laws of the Qur-ān, and to level down all differences and diversities of rank and race and to remove all inequalities, social as well as political. The ideal put before the Islāmic State was to Islāmize the people without injuring the religious susceptibilities of the Zimmis (non-Muslims). The Prophet of Islām founded a theocratic State and gave a conclusive proof of its practicability. Not long after him, however, reactions set in throughout the Islāmic world and 'shifted the Islāmic political ideal from its fulcrum to an ever-changing political gravitation'. So great in fact was the change that came over the Islāmic world that even the sponsors and stalwarts of Islāmic principles and practices lost respect for them and cared little to safeguard or promote the interests of Islām. With the conquest of Persia and the flow of wealth the theocratic form of government made room for a secular State. The Shariyat ceased to influence politics. On the other hand, it was influenced by political considerations. With the rise of the Ommayyades to power and the transfer of the seat of government to Damascus, the change became more pronounced Amir Muāwiya resorted to all sorts of means for his political aggrandizement. Under him the State was completely secularized. Under him the interests of Islām were relegated to the background. But for the unique sacrifice of Hussain made at the desert of Karbala, the fate of Islām would have been sealed. * Musalmāns—not Islām, as erroneously supposed by some,—had drifted afar from the high ideals set forth by the leaders. Under the cover of religion ambitious leaders easily advanced their political interests and founders of States and not preachers, propagators or defenders of the Faith, though they often posed to be and not builders such persons. Their acts may easily be justified politically, but not Islāmically. Mahmūd was the product of his environments. Quite in keeping with the spirit of the age, he also advanced his political interests under the cloak of religion. † Utbi informs us that soon after

* Hence the need and not the greed for gold lay at the root of his Indian invasions

* See T. T., vi, 184, I K, II, 11, 11, Usād al-Ghaba by Ibn Asir Jazri, iii, 299, 401, Istiāb by Ibn Abdul-Barr, 1, 66, 154, Swāiq-i-Muhīraqa, 56, 135, Islām under the Arabs by Osborn, and A Short History of the Saracens by Amir 'Alī, 95.

† Clever leaders too often hired the services of corrupt Ulama who turned and twisted the meaning of some verses of the Holy Qur'an and interpreted them so as to serve their ends, and to those who were always out to find or forge moral and religious support for their

his recognition as an independent ruler by the Khalifa of Baghdad Mahmud made it obligatory on himself to invade India every year. Modern writers have put a new interpretation on this statement and tried to ascribe religious motivation to what were admittedly political exploits. Their interpretation is not supported or substantiated by historical evidence. The pledge given to the Khalifa was not the only Leitmotif in his invasions of India. It would perhaps be more proper to say that underlying the pledge were political motives and the cries of 'holy wars' etc. were raised to stir up the soldiers to action and to ensure further recruitments. The resolution was made with a view "to please the Khalifa with whom he wished to cultivate most cordial and loyal relations in order to cover the illegitimate revolutionary origin of his dynasty, which was still fresh in the memory of the men of time he maintained the most loyal relations with the spiritual head of Islam, the Khalif of Baghdad, Al-Kadîr (881-422 A.H.), who had clad the usurpation of his family with the mantle of legitimacy and in order to please him he hunted down the heretics in his realm in Khurasan and in Multan, impaling or stoning millions, such verses of the sacred text as 'Obey Allah, obey the Apostle and obey those in authority from among you' (S. i., V. 59) and "Do Jihâd against the unbelievers" (S. ix., V. 73) were full of possibilities of ingenious interpretations. They fully exploited these verses for gratifying their ends. (See my book on Some Cultural Aspects of Muslim Rule in India, pp. 13, 15-18)

them. He tried to rid the Khalif of the real or suspected votaries of his opponent, the Anti-Khalif in Egypt, the famous Hakim  Politically, the Khilāfat had become bankrupt and the Khalifa an almost nonentity, but the institution still commanded the respect of the Muslim world and the Khalifa was still 'a useful ally for a warrior who was burning with the desire for expansion'. Political considerations and not religious sentiments were at the root of Mahmūd's loyalty to the Khalifa. He obeyed the Khalifa and persecuted the Carmāthians and other non-Sunnis, against whom the latter had declared a war, because he wished to win through him the good-will of the Muslim world for strengthening the foundations of his kingdom. In appreciation of his services, the Khalifa heaped upon him and his sons honours and titles which immensely enhanced his prestige in the Muslim world. Gradually, however, as his might and means increased and his name was surrounded by a halo of glory, even this outward respect for the moribund institution was grudged †. We hear of at least three great ruptures in his relations with the Khalifa when he decided to shake off the supremacy of that nominal power—

* Sachao's Alberfī. Also see M G , 160-61

† According to Dr M Nāzim, "The Sultān became less obsequious towards him (Khalifa) and sometimes months passed before Baghhdād was officially informed of his victories" (M G , 165) This change of attitude is evident from the letters addressed by him to the Khalifa and preserved in the Tajārib, iii, 341-44

for the first time when the Khalīfa refused to give him Samarqand and he threatened him with the invasion of his capital (Bağdād) with one thousand elephants so as to lay it waste and carry its earth to his own capital (Ghaznīn) on their backs, for the second time when Abū 'Alī Hasan (Hasanak) received a robe of honour from al-Zāhir, the Fātimid Khalīfa of Cairo, on his return from a pilgrimage to Mecca and the Khalīfa of Bağdād sent a strongly worded letter to the Sultān, directing him to order the immediate execution of Hasanak on the charge of subscribing to the Carmāthian creed,† and for the third time when he left his son, Mas'ūd, at Rayy with instructions to conquer Isfahān and 'release the Caliph from the bondage of the Buwāihids' with a view 'to bring the Caliph under his sway' ‡ On the first occasion he disarmed the opposition of the Khalīfa only by making profuse apologies and adopting a reverential attitude towards him On the second occasion he appeased the Khalīfa by sending Hasanak's robe of honour to Bağdād, where it was burnt to ashes in a public square On the third occasion his death upset his plans and schemes From all that has been said it is clear that he had scant courtesy for the Khalīfa, though he did not want to offend the power which had strengthened his position

* T F , i, 28 and T H , i, 277

† T M , 211-212, K T , ix, 239, and V G , 165

‡ T M , 83 and 359

morally and which, even in its hour of weakness,
was strong enough to shake and shatter the moral foundations of his empire.*

Now that we have acquainted ourselves with the religious currents and cross-currents of politico-religious history of Mahmūd's times, it has become easy for us to proceed with our inquiry into the motives of Mahmūd in leading so many expeditions against India. But before proceeding with the inquiry it will be proper to answer the following questions —

(1) Were Mahmūd's invasions of India really Jihāds? (2) Was propagation of Islam in India his chief aim? (3) Was extirpation of idolatry his main object? (4) Was territorial annexation the inspiring motive?

Were Mahmūd's invasions of India Jihāds? —
Were Indian Invasions Jihāds? In order to answer this question correctly, it is necessary to know what Jihād really means. The word Jihād is a derivative, of which the root is Jahd or Juhd, which means power, exertion or struggle. The Qur'ānic conception of Jihād is contained in verse 20 of Sūra ix of the Qur'ān, which reads "Those who believe, and suffer exile and strive with might and main, in God's cause with their goods and their persons,
have the highest rank in the sight of God.

* See M. G., 160 61

They are the people who will achieve (salvation)  Allāma Abdullah Yūsuf Alī has beautifully summed up the meaning of this verse in the following words "Here is a good description of Jihād. It may require fighting in God's cause, as a form of self-sacrifice. But its essence consists in (1) a true and sincere Faith, which so fixes its gaze on God, that all selfish and worldly motives seem paltry and fade away, and (2) an earnest and ceaseless activity, involving the sacrifice (if need be) of life, person or property, in the service of God. Mere brutal fighting is opposed to the whole spirit of Jihād, while the sincere scholar's pen or preacher's voice or wealthy man's contribution may be the most valuable forms of

* This is what the Qurān enjoins. Hostile critics of Islām have taken some stray verses from the Qurān and forced on them interpretations which the text and the trend of the text do not at all bear. For instance, the so called Sūrat us-Saif or "the Sūrat of the Sword" is taken out from the text and interpreted to mean 'war against unbelief,' and argued that Islām enjoins the use of the sword for the spread of the faith. Now if this verse is read with the text that precedes it, the correct meaning becomes quite clear. It then means war against aggressive and perfidious unbelievers and not against all. Going further, it is ordered that war should cease as soon as the opponents sue for peace. Why to enter into a peace before the opponents are done to death or converted to Islām? This militates against the theory of force and conclusively proves that fighting is recommended in Islām only for the preservation of peace. The correctness of this interpretation is warranted by the Qurānic injunctions "Let there be no compulsion in religion", and "Commit no excesses", and by the life of the Prophet and his

~~THE GHAZNAWIS~~

Jihad" Looked at in the light of the Holy Qur'an, Mahmud's expeditions against India cannot be called Jihads. From their very character it appears that they were secular exploits and not religious wars waged for the cause of Islam or in the service of God. Mahmud's armies were composed of professional soldiers and mercenaries of various denominations and not Mujahids or holy warriors. War was the prevailing passion or rather the fashion of the day, and the spirit of the age, not the sanction of the Qur'an, was behind them. Incidentally, it may be pointed out here that Mahmud was not an Amir as Islam would have it and his was not a State attitude towards the Zimmis, which throw a flood of light on the real significance of Jihad. In verse 73 of Sura ix the Prophet is ordered to "do Jihad against the unbelievers and the hypocrites". And what were the weapons employed by him for that Jihad—kindness, generosity, forgiveness, charity, peace, respect and what not. History teems with instances to illustrate this point and they drive us to the conclusion that Jihad means anything but bloodshed for the spread of the faith. See Al-Qur'an, ii, 190-93, 216-17, 243-51, 256, iv, 74-76, 84, 170; viii, 39, 41, and xvn, 4, 20, 16, 20, 29, 73, 123, xxi, 39, 41, and xvn, 4, 20 note 1270.

* The Holy Qur'an (translated by A Y 'Ali), p. 444,

† It may be noted here that Islamic wars are always defensive and in the service of God. Islam is always at war against Evil, but as a religion of peace it recommends peaceful methods for fighting it out. The use of the sword is permitted in exceptional circumstances, e.g., when the life and liberty of Muslims and their honour and religion are in danger.

contemplated by the Qur-an. He was an absolute monarch and his government was far from theocracy. Before launching a campaign against idolatry or Jihad against the infidels, he ought to have Islāmized his own State and acted in accordance with the principles of Islām in the matter of succession to the throne and other important affairs, if he was a true and sincere champion of Islām, as he is supposed to have been.

Like a good Muslim, who is always expected to be an active missionary of his religion, Mahmūd might have felt delighted in the spread of his faith, but that does not seem to have been the only object underlying his Indian expeditions. He was more of a conqueror than a fanatical propagandist, or a pious missionary. To say that he invaded India time and again for the spread of his religion is historically wrong and psychologically untrue. In the first place, there is no scrap of evidence in the contemporary chronicles to show that he ever won converts, whether by force or by peaceful means *. We do come across one or two instances when he is said to have appointed teachers and preachers for the instruction of new converts and Hindūs in the rudiments of Islam †. Whether this was done in response to the dictates of his conscience or out of political motives—, for he had to please and pacify those whom he had brought to India on the pretext of Jihâds or ‘holy wars’—, may remain a matter of moot, but it is abundantly clear that nothing useful was accomplished by him so far as the spread of Islâm in India was concerned “Some râjas are said to have embraced Islâm,” says Dr M Nazîm, “but they did so most probably as a political shift to escape the fury of the conqueror and returned to their faith as soon as he had turned his back on them.”* This was obviously because the Hindûs were not yet told and taught what Islâm was and what it stood for “The period of Sultân Mahmûd,” says the same scholar, “was essentially a period of conquest” and “the time was not yet ripe for missionary work which required settled government”† The policy of conquest and consolidation, it may be observed, was not followed and no attempt was made to establish a settled government in India, otherwise one province, permanently occupied, would have done far more for conversion than all his invasions together The whole of Mahmûd’s time in India was spent in waging wars and amassing wealth and he had little leisure to devote to the sacred cause Consequently; he is not entitled to the ‘credit’ which he has received from his misinformed admirers for the alleged propagation of

* It is a different thing if a Hindū Rāja and his followers embraced Islām to escape defeat and destruction.

† Z A , 72 and 78-79

* M G , 162

† Ibid, 162

Islam in India * Secondly, Islam was not presented to the Hindus in the manner prescribed by the Prophet. In matters of faith it is the method of presentation that matters much and no religion can score success, such as Islam has done, if it is conveyed through the agency of wars and bloodshed † The Prophet of Islam did not

* Ignorant fanatics who extol Mahmud for propagating Islam in India at the point of the sword, which he never did, do him more harm than good and indirectly bring discredit to Islam which enjoins universal toleration and positively forbids the use of force in effecting conversions

† This point requires some elucidation. Propagation of Islam in India was not the inspiring motive of Mahmud's invasions of India, but there is absolutely no doubt that his Indian expeditions were given out to be and understood as 'Jihads' or holy wars, undertaken for the extirpation of idolatry and the propagation of Islam in India. It is in this sense that Professor Muhammad Habib (S V G, 81) has remarked that "the career of the conquering Ghaznavide created a burning hatred for the new faith in the Hindu mind" because it was presented "in the guise of plundering armies". Dr M Nazim has misunderstood this remark and therefore criticised it. In his opinion "The Hindus rejected Islam as their national religion because of the fundamental and irreconcilable differences between Islam and Hinduism". The learned Doctor has tried to substantiate his point by saying that "Islam, with its definite articles of faith, could not appeal to the average Hindu to whom religion had never meant any specified set of doctrines". He is sadly mistaken. In my opinion Islam is nothing if not natural and conducive to human welfare—spiritual as well as secular. It was nothing if it failed to appeal to the down-trodden Hindus—Hindus who had been subjected to grave inequalities and who had become fed up with the lot assigned to them by their preach his faith by waging wars and leading expeditions against the infidels Mahmūd, whose knowledge of Islamic theology was undisputed, cannot be said to have been ignorant of such injunctions of the Qur-an as "Lā ikraha fid dīn" (Let there be no compulsion in religion) His religious policy was based on toleration and "he is not said to have forced any Hindū to abjure his religion or to have put any person to death for the sake of conscience" * Referring to his religious policy, M Elphinstone tells us that "it is nowhere asserted that he ever put religion A large majority of the Hindūs were in need of a shelter and no religion could provide a better shelter for them than Islām Their minds were quite open to receive the truth Presented in its proper form and propagated in the manner prescribed by the Prophet, Islām was sure to reap a rich harvest The subsequent history of Islām in India bears eloquent testimony to this hard historical fact The only difficulty in its way was the opposition of the Brahmans who had grown fat at the expense of low-caste Hindūs, such as Shudras, because Islām—with its democratic principles of equality and brotherhood—would have dealt a death-blow to their supremacy, which they so jealously guarded But with the majority of the Hindūs in its favour, it was not difficult to overcome their opposition "The fundamental and irreconcilable differences between Islām and Hindūism," referred to by Dr M Nāzim, ought to have facilitated rather than retarded the work of conversion in India, for if Islām and Hindūism were alike, there was no need for change and conversion would have been out of question,

* P P-M T, 45 "Though zealous for Islām," says Sir W Haig, "he maintained a large body of Hindū troops, and there is no reason to believe that conversion was a condition of their service" (C H I, III, 27)

a Hindū to death except in battle or in the storm of a fort ^{} Under him the Hindūs enjoyed perfect religious freedom They were entrusted with highly responsible posts, and religion was not a condition of their service The names of Tilak, Rāi Hindū, Hajrāi and Sonī stand out pre-eminently in the military history of Ghaznī [†] Mahmūd was a conqueror and he drew no hard and fast lines between Hindūs and Muslims in his schemes of conquest Of his Indian expeditions at least two were led against the Muslims for much the same reasons as against the Hindū Rajas, and almost all his Central Asian expeditions were led against Muslims "If he harassed the Hindū rajas of India," says Dr M Nazim, "he did not spare the Muslim sovereigns of Irān and Transoxiana The drama of plunder and bloodshed that was enacted in the sacred Ganges Doab was repeated with no less virulence on the slopes of the Mount Damāwand and the banks of the river Oxus Religious considerations rarely weighed with a conqueror and the Sultān does not appear to have been influenced by them in his schemes of conquest "[‡] His transactions with Hindū Rajas were guided entirely by policy, without reference to religion, and he cannot be blamed or praised for what he never did nor attempted to do Was then, it may well be asked now, propagation of Islām his object in leading

^r H I, 293

[†] P P-M T, 46

[‡] M G, 163

his expeditions against India? Emphatically not. Like other kings, who preceded and followed him, Mahmūd did not concern himself with the work of conversion—that was left to saints and savants like Sayyad 'Alī Hujveri and Muīn-ud-Din Chishti—for his own hands were too full of political pre-occupations to leave him leisure to turn his attention to that side. No honest historian can conceal the truth and no Muslim, acquainted with his faith, can justify Mahmūd's expeditions from religious point of view and call them Jihāds. Far from enjoining or recommending, Islām—which means peace, which preaches peace and which stands for universal peace—does not even countenance the use of force for the spread of the faith and no principle known to the Shariyat enjoins, recommends, justifies or countenances systematic spoliation of temples and places of worship for the acquisition of wealth.

Mahmūd launched no organized effort to Extirpation of idolatry? destroy idolatry in India. He attacked shrines, raised temples to the ground and broke idols to pieces* not because it was meritorious from religious

* It may be noted here that in those times the Musalmāns (or rather new converts to Islām) had become so fed up with idolatry and carried such a deep seated prejudice against it that soon after their conversion they made it a point to destroy its root and branch. If, therefore, Mahmūd broke idols at some places, it was most probably in order to please his followers. His expeditions were

point of view, but because they were fortified places, containing treasures of India's fabulous wealth. No temples, other than those of the kind described above, were touched, and once peace was concluded everything was safe and toleration in the widest sense of the word was granted to all and sundry. While referring to "the mundane motives" of Mahmud's Indian invasions, Dr Ishwara Topa says "It may also be observed that the temples of India which Mahmud raided were storehouses of enormous and untold wealth and also some of these were political centres. The temples were, in fact broken during the campaigns for reasons other than religious, but in times of peace Mahmud never demolished a single temple.* If the destruction of temples and understood as Jihāds (holy wars or wars against unbelief) and hence the historians of that age have also referred to them as such and given full vent to their own religious vanity. Mark the change in the conception of Jihād.

* Politics in Pre-Mughal Times, pp. 46-47. Dr M. Nazim's remarks in this connection are equally interesting. He says "The critics who accuse the Sultān of wanton bloodshed and reckless spoliation of Hindu temples, forget that these so called barbarities were committed in the course of legitimate warfare, when such acts are sanctioned by the practice of all the great conquerors of the world. Spoils captured from a defeated enemy have always been considered the lawful property of the victorious army. In India, however, wealth was accumulated, not only in the coffers of the kings, as in other countries, but also in the vaults of the temples which were consecrated to the service of various deities. The consequence was that, while elsewhere the capture of the defeated monarch's treasury usually gratified the conqueror's lust for mummom, the extinction of idolatry or the spread of Islam in India were his motive, he ought to have followed that policy in times of peace as well, first in his own country and then outside, and then there was no need to enter into treaties without achieving the object. We know it for certain that the Hindus enjoyed full toleration under Sultan Mahmud Al-Ma'arrī informs us that they were granted separate quarters in the Imperial Ghaznīn and allowed to observe their religious ceremonies without any let or hindrance.* In other words, they were quite free to blow their Sankh and to bow before their idols under the very nose of the Sultan.

Conquest or territorial annexation? Was conquest or territorial annexation his chief object? This too is far-fetched, for he never contemplated an Indian empire. Perhaps, he knew that a Muslim empire in an alien country was then almost impossible, that it would involve a great waste of men and money if he tried to hold in subjection a race hostile in religion and language, customs and traditions, tastes and temperaments, habits and hobbies, and that it was beyond the range of practical politics to establish his sway in Central Asia as well as in India simultaneously. Nor does permanent annexation seem to have been his principal motive. The annexation of a part of the Punjāb and some other places such as Sind and Multān, which lay contiguous to the Ghaznawid Empire, proves rather than refutes his non-territorial designs. The Punjāb was annexed, because with it as a base Mahmūd could successfully attack the places beyond. His western campaigns, on the other hand, disclose a different policy—that of acquisition and annexation, conquest and consolidation. At times, when necessary, he himself, even when his health did not permit, supervised the expeditions undertaken against his enemies and tried to establish his sway in the newly conquered territories in the west, not so in the east.

* "in India temples were also ransacked to secure the piles of gold and precious stones in them" (M.G., 163)

The inspiring motive What it may then be asked, was the inspiring motive? The establishment of a Turko-Persian or Central Asian empire and nothing beyond that was the chief motive of Mahmūd's Indian invasions, which were undertaken for the realization of that object. In the first place, they gave him the much-needed appellation of "holy warrior" and enhanced his prestige in the Muslim world, and secondly, they cemented his strength and constituted a great financial asset to his military resources. In other words, his Indian expeditions were undertaken for political as well as economic purposes,* and in many respects they were justified, for in the first clash between the Hindus and the Musalmāns in the reign of Subuktigīn the former were the aggressors and when defeated and reduced to submission they renounced allegiance, formed confederacies to stem the rising tide of the Ghaznawids and fought against Mahmūd

* Professor M. Habib is perfectly right in saying that "Islam sanctioned neither the vandalism nor the plundering motives of the invader," but I do not find it possible to

Sultān Mahmūd invaded India time and

Results of Mahmud's invasions
of India again and conquered a number of places Almost the whole of Northern India felt the force of his arms, but the results of his victories were far from permanent The one permanent result of his seventeen successful invasions of India was that only a few of the places he had conquered there, were permanently annexed to the Empire of Ghaznīn, for after his death only a portion of the Punjāb, Sind and some parts of the adjoining provinces, such as Multān, acknowledged his suzerainty Elsewhere in India, the results of his expeditions and of a series of agree with him when he says that Mahmūd's attacks on India were "un-called for" and that "the Hindu princes had done Mahmūd and his subjects no harm" (S M G, 79) See supra, pp 85 ff, where I have made it abundantly clear that the Hindus were the aggressors and that they themselves were responsible for exciting the hostilities of the Ghaznawids The Ghaznawids paid them in their own coin with, of course, compound interest If they had not done so, the Hindus would have enacted the role of conquerors and the fate of the Ghaznawids would have been sealed This is what my reading of the original sources has led me to.

victories soon wore off. His rule did not take root in the places he conquered and the Rājputs re-established their rule in Northern India, excepting the few places referred to above, and continued to rule for about two centuries more. Thus, while Amīr Subuktigīn had left Peshawar as an outpost of Ghaznīn, his more celebrated son and successor, Sultān Mahmūd, left the Punjab as an outpost of his far-flung Central Asian empire. This was the net-result of his seventeen expeditions of India so far as conquest or territorial annexations were concerned.

But the effects of Mahmūd's invasions of India were far more enduring than EFFECTS— their results Politically—These expeditions paved the way for the establishment of a permanent Muslim empire in India by flinging open its gates to the subsequent Muslim invaders, by exposing the weaknesses of the Indian political and military systems and by establishing the superiority of the Musalmāns over the Hindūs in the art of war, discipline and devotion to duty. Economically—They were a heavy drain on India's age-long accumulated wealth. They made India much poorer and contributed vastly to the glory and grandeur that was Ghaznīn. They were a great financial asset to Mahmūd's military programme, because they immeasurably augmented his resources and ensured his success by enabling him to finance his schemes of conquest without experiencing any difficulty. Culturally—They brought two great civil

THE GHAZNAWIDS

108

Islam and Hindūism—into contact and led to mutual intercourse between Hindūs and Musalmāns. In the train of Muslim warriors and warlords came Muslim saints and savants who permeated the ranks of Indian society, propagated Islam in India and won a number of converts. In a land of idolaters, littered with temples, containing myriads of man-made gods and sounding with temple bells, mosques were founded and cries of Lā-ilāhā-illallaho Muhammad-ur-Rasūl-ullah (There is no God but Allah and Muhammad is His prophet) and Allah o Akbar (God is Great) began to sound and pronounce the unity of God. But for the successful invasions of Sultān Mahmūd it would have been well nigh impossible for the Muslim missionaries to settle down in India and carry on their work peacefully. Their importance from Islāmic point of view lies in the fact that they indirectly facilitated the future progress of Islam in India. But this had nothing to do with the motives of Mahmūd and we are not prepared to assign him any credit for what he never did nor aimed to do.

CHAPTER V

SULTAN MAHMUD THE GREAT—IV

CULTURAL ACTIVITIES OF HIS REIGN

Great as a conqueror, fit to rank with the greatest conquerors of the world like Introductory Alexander the Great Mahmud was equally great as a man of culture and refinement. His achievements in the arts of peace were on a par with his victories in the science of war and compare favourably with those of Cæsar Augustus. An attempt is made in this chapter to bring out in brief the contributions he made to the cause of Islamic culture and civilization.

In order to appreciate his work, it is necessary to have an idea of his tastes. Mahmud's love of learning We have already said something about his education in connection with his early life.* In continuation of that account it may be observed that he grew up to be a good scholar and a fine poet.† Some of his poetical compositions are preserved by 'Awfi in his Lubab-ul-Albab.‡ He was very fond of Islamic law and Tradition and his proficiency in these subjects was recognized even

* See supra, pp 24-26

† M G, 156-57, and Lubab ul-Albab, II, 24

‡ Lubab-ul-Albab, II, 24

by the most practised theologians of the day. Fiqh seems to have been his most favourite subject, for his name is intimately associated with the authorship of a standard work on the subject, called *Tasrif ul Fiqh Allāma Ibn Khalkān informs us that Imām-ul-Haramain Abul Ma'ali Abdul Mulk Jawāīn has recorded in his work entitled Mughīs ul-Khalq fi Iktiyār-ul-Haq that Mahmūd was deeply interested in Aḥādīth (Traditions), that Ulamā, possessing a profound knowledge of the subject, used to meet at his Court and recite Aḥādīth in his presence, and that he listened to them with great avidity and asked them to explain the points which he did not understand †

Himself a scholar and a poet and a true lover of learning, Mahmūd was in a position to judge and appreciate literary merits, and hence he rose to be one of the greatest patrons of letters. The literary renaissance of Persia found in him a most powerful exponent and his contributions to the development of Persian literature assign him a high place in the literary history of Persia. His patronage of Persian literature has rarely

* Some scholars have expressed doubts about Mahmūd's authorship of the book, but there is nothing improbable in it (See M G, 157 note)

† Tārikh-i-Ibn Khalkān (Ed. ed.), II, 86, and I K, II, viii, (translators note), 256 ff

‡ L H P, I, II, S A, I, and S P L

been surpassed * Like many a Muslim king he loved the society of learned men and used to invite them to his Court from distant countries † His bounty attracted a large number of scholars to Ghaznīn and made it a centre of light and learning for all Asia While the French Napoleon used to import the choicest works of art and literature from the countries he conquered to add to the beauty and grandeur of Paris, the Ghaznawid Napoleon fetched over to his beloved Ghaznīn the artists, scholars and poets in person from the regions he reduced to his sway in order to enhance the splendour of his famous Court He accorded a most warm welcome to learned refugees from all climes and countries and took care to carry out their wishes Whenever he conquered a new town, he at once transported to his capital all the choicest works of art and literature obtained from its libraries and museums and thus augmented the wealth of art and literature already accumulated there ‡ The celebrated author of the Tarikh-i-Gusidah informs us that he spent a sum of not less than 400,000 dīndars per year

* Barthold's view (Turkestan, 289) that Mahmūd's patronage of learning was due to an ostentatious desire to convert his Court into a cradle of culture and not to an innate love of learning is erroneous and ill-founded Mahmūd might have been influenced by this ulterior motive, but in view of the fact that he was himself a scholar, a poet and an author, it cannot be said that his love of learning was not genuine

† T M , 232-33, 245 and 247

‡ K T , 11, 262

on the literary luminaries of his realm * Ferishta would have us believe that no King had ever gathered more learned men at his Court than Mahmūd † M Elphinstone says that "he showed so much munificence to individuals of eminence that his capital exhibited a greater assemblage of literary genius than any other monarch in Asia has ever been able to produce" ‡ Dr M Nāzim assures us that "his meanest rewards were calculated in thousands of dinārs, and the later generations of poets have cherished his memory as a giver of elephant-loads of gold and silver" § This is enough to indicate the extent of Mahmūd's literary interest and now we shall make a short reference to the progress of Persian language and literature under his patronage.

Renaissance of Persian literature The Arab conquest of Persia was fraught with far-reaching consequences. With the transfer of the seat of Islamic Government to Baghdād, the cultural centre of gravity also shifted there, and Persian ideas and ideals began to flow fast into the ranks of Muslim society to change its outlook on life and letters. When the Arabs came into close contact with the Persians, they took an unusual fancy to the culture of the conquered and in their eager fascination for it

* T G , 39

† T F , 1,

‡ H I , 29

§ M G , 1

they forgot to pick and choose from Persian ideas. They assimilated them wholesale in almost every department of administration and in every sphere of social life. Politically, they adopted the system of Persian government—division and organization of the various departments of the State, their names and functions, the entire paraphernalia of Persian monarchy—the personality of the Persian King, his seraglio, his slaves, his servants, State ceremonials and all other symbols of sovereignty. Socially, they imbibed Persian ideas of social pleasures and pastimes and took over from the Persians their chase, chess and Chaugān (polo), drinking, music and songs, and even their national spring festival of Nauroz. Culturally they made Persian their Court language and took almost all Persian ideas, including Ta'bīr or the science of interpreting dreams. Here we are chiefly concerned with the cultural side of this all-embracing influence.* In a nut-shell, Persian language and literature received a new lease of life as a result of this change. When, after the fall of the Abbāsid Khilāfat, the Sāmānids established their sway in Transoxiana and extended it to Turkistān, Isfahān and Khurāsān, Persian superseded Arabic and became the language of the court and the country. The Tārikh-i-Tabāri, a standard work on Islāmic history, was translated into Persian from Arabic by the Vazīr of one of the Sāmānids in 946 A.C. and poets like

* For some more details, see my book on "Some Cultural Aspects of Muslim Rule in India, pp. 6 ff.

Rūdīkī* began to use Persian as their medium of expression. The Sāmānid Kings were great patrons of Persian language and literature, and poetry in particular made much progress under their patronage. The fall of their dynasty left the literary luminaries unremunerated and they flocked eagerly to Ghaznīn, the new home of light and learning and the new cradle of the sage and the scholar. There they were accorded a most warm welcome and there they found full scope for the display of their talents. It would be impossible, even if the author were competent, to do full justice to the subject within the scope of a small chapter †. Attention is therefore focussed on the achievements of some of the most important scholars and poets who flourished under the patronage of Sultān Mahmūd, contributed vastly to Persian literary culture and immortalized the name of their Imperial patron.

The versatile Abū Rihān Muhammād bin
Ahmad, known to history as Al-Alberūnī Alberūnī (the foreigner), comes first in order of importance. He was

* He received 80,000 dirhams from a Sāmānid Prince for a moral work (H. I., 290 foot-note)

† Competent scholars like Browne, Shibli and Azad have written volumes on the subject and the more inquisitive readers would find much to quench their thirst for knowledge with in their works entitled A Literary History of Persia, Shir-ul-'Ajam and Sukhandān-i-Pāras respectively. The Tazkarat-ush-Shu'ara by Amīr Daulat Shāh also contains much useful information on the subject, chiefly on poetry.

decidedly the most shining star in the firmament of Mahmûd's literary world. As a versatile genius, he was un-equalled, unapproached and unrivalled. At once an astronomer, philosopher, geographer, mathematician, chronologist and a profound scholar of Sanskrit, Alberûnî's mind was indeed "encyclopaedic". He was brought from his native Khwârizm as a captive, thrown into prison and subsequently exiled into Hindûstân on that life of travel and tour to which we owe the immortal Tahqîq-ma-lil-Hind, which is a veritable mine of information about the life and thought of contemporary India. He travelled all over India, applied his vigorous intellect to the study of the language of the Hindus, their arts and sciences, their philosophy and literature, their customs and traditions, in short, the entire paraphernalia of their civilization, and embodied his observations in a book which is a great asset to the study of Hindû history and an indispensable source of information. The philosophic and scientific spirit that animates Alberûnî in the laborious and sympathetic treatment of his subject on an alien culture is a complete contrast to the pride and prejudice of the narrow-minded scholars of the West and serves as an imperishable index to the intellectual character of Islâm and the catholicity of Muslim mind. In return for his knowledge of their customs and traditions, their thoughts and ideas, he communicated to the people of India the wisdom of the Baghdâdian school*. His work on astronomy, called Al-qanūn-al-Mas'ūdī, or "the Canon Masudicus" after the name of his Imperial patron, Sultān Mas'ūd, is a milestone of literary research and a monument to his memory. His Tahqīq ma-lil-Hind,* which amply manifests the extent to which the Muslim scholars had turned the treasures of Greek lore to fruitful purposes, is an embodiment of well-digested erudition and untiring industry. His another great work, which deserves specific mention, is the Asar ul-Baqriya or "the Vestiges of the Past" † He also translated into Arabic the Sanskrit work entitled Karanatilaka by Vijayānanda, son of Jayānanda, of Benāres, and renamed it Ghurrat-uz-Zījat. Besides these master pieces of literature, he wrote many other books on different subjects, such as astronomy, mathematics, geography, physics and chemistry.

* The Spirit of Islâm, Amîr 'Alî, 380, O H I , 194

Abū Nasr Muhammad bin Muhammad al-Jabbār al-'Utbī ‡ was a distinguished historian and penman attached to the Court of Sultān Mahmūd. He wrote a history of the reign of his Imperial

* This work has been translated into English by Dr E C Sachau under the title "Alberuni's India". The original title of the work is Tahqīq-ma-lil-Hind and not Tārikh-ul-Hind or Tārikh-i-Hind, as wrongly given in some books, e.g., E & D, p 1, and Encyclopædia of Islām, 1, 726.

† This work also is translated by Dr E C Sachau under the title 'The Chronology of Ancient Nations'

‡ For his life and work, see al-'Utbī in Ency of Islām

patron, entitled Kitāb-ul-Yamīnī or Tārīkh-i-Yamīnī which though deficient in dates and details, is still an indispensable authority on the life and work of Sultān Mahmūd. From literary point of view it is very ornate and the author seems to have concentrated more on the beauty of style and diction than on historical data and dates of important events.

Among others who deserve specific mention in this hurried survey were Al-Farābī the famous philosopher who was considered 'a second Aristotle' by the Arabs of his day and honoured and prized by Mahmūd the more since the refusal of his precursor, Abū 'Alī Sīnā (Avicenna)* who was 'undoubtedly one of the greatest thinkers and physicians the world has produced', to join his Court, Abdul Malik bin Muhammad bin Ismā'il as-Salabī, the learned author of a metrical history of Irān from the earliest times to the reign of Sultān Mahmūd, called Kitāb fī Ghurar-i-Akhbār-i-Muluk-ul-Furs,† Abul Fazl Muhammad bin Hussain al-Baihaqī,‡ the

* On his refusal to accept Mahmūd's invitation, he was hunted down from place to place till at last he found a safe asylum with one of the Buwāhid rulers of Rayy, who was a great patron of Persian literature (L H P 1, 95 ff.)

† Originally this work covered four volumes. Of them, only the first two have survived and the other two have disappeared. The two that have survived deal with the pre-Islāmic period and the Prophet Muhammad.

‡ For his life and work, see Ency of Islām, 1, 592

reputed author of the Maqāmat-i-Abū Nasr-i-Muškānī,* the Majalladāt and a collection of important diplomatic correspondence of Sultān Maṣ'ūd and probably of Mahmūd as well, called Zinat-ul-Kuttab,† Mahmūd-al-Warrāq, the author of a universal history ending with the year 1018 A C,§ and Hilāl bin Muḥassīn bin Ibrāhīm as-Sabī, the author of the Zail Tajārib-ul-Umam, containing in detail the letters of victory sent by the Sultān to the Khalīfa of Baghdād.¶

* This work, now no longer extant, contained much useful information on the reign of Sultān Mahmūd, as is evident from the extracts preserved in the Jawāmi ul-Hikāyat and Asār-ul-Wuzarā.

† This was a monumental work, covering as many as 30 volumes. It was a most comprehensive history of the Yāmīni Dynasty (Sultān Mahmūd and his successors), beginning from the year 1018 A C, and coming down to 1068 A C. Only the second half of the 6th volume and volumes 7-9 and a part of the 10th volume, dealing with the reign of Sultān Maṣ'ūd, are preserved and the rest lost. Several parts of this work were known after the names and titles of the Ghaznawid rulers. For instance, the part dealing with the reign of Mahmūd was named Tārikh-i-Yāmīni after his title (Yāmīn ud Daulah) and that dealing with the reign of Maṣ'ūd was called Tārikh-i-Maṣ'ūdi after his name. The Tārikh-i-Yāmīni is a most valuable work and its importance lies in the fact that it was based on original State papers and a diary which its author used to keep.

‡ This work too has been lost (M G, 2).

§ T M, 317. Also see M G, 3.

¶ A part of this chronicle, covering an account of three years (390 2 A H), has survived. It has been published by Professor D S Margoliouth in the third volume of the Tajārib ul-Umam of Abū 'Alī Ahmad bin Muḥammad Miskawayh.

delicacy and tenderness that characterize others and the Homeric simplicity that pervades most of it. The most striking feature of the book was the absence of Arabic words and phrases, but it has undergone so many changes and suffered so much in diction that it is now conspicuous for the absence of this feature. The constructive genius of Firdausī achieved victories far more enduring than those of his master. The Ghaznawid Empire built by the latter crumbled to dust a decade after his death, but the Shāhnāmāh, the crowning achievement of Firdausī, will live for ever as a monument to his memory.

'Unsari,^{*} the scientist, philosopher, linguist and, with the possible exception of Firdausī, the greatest genius of the age, next engages our attention. He may be mentioned as the best instance of a man raised to honour and affluence for literary merits alone. His extemporaneous effusions, his odes and encomiums, his voluptuous metaphors and, above all, his pure and powerful diction, exquisitely polished and extremely charming, assign him a place second only to that of Firdausī in the history of Persian poetry. He versified the victories and conquests of Sultān Mahmūd, and this part of his work is very useful for historical purposes. In recognition of his services and in appreciation of his merits, he was

* His full name was Hasan bin Ahmad

honoured with the title of Malak-us-Shu'ara (poet-laureate) and entrusted with the work of looking through the poetical compositions of all the accomplished poets of the kingdom before being submitted to the Sultān. This enhanced his prestige and influence and also raised him to honour and title. He left behind a āitār of about 80,000 verses *

Among other poets who flocked to Ghaznī and flourished at the Imperial Court, Other poets the most distinguished were Daqīqī, who had first undertaken the stupendous task of writing the Shāhnāmāh and had composed more or less 1,000 verses, Ghazārī Rāzī, to whom a reference has already been made, Asadī Tūsī, the honoured teacher of Firdausī, who is said to have completed the Shāhnāmāh by contributing as many as 4,000 verses, 'Asjādī Marvī, Farrukhī Tirmizī and Minūchihīr Balkhī †

The preceding account, though exceptionally brief and perfunctory, is, however, Criticism enough to convey the idea that the of poets age of Sultān Mahmūd was an age of literary efflorescence when poetry in particular progressed by leaps and bounds. Some of the poets attached to the Ghaznawid Court, especially those referred to above, were renowned all

* Vide T. S., Tatqiqat Awraq

† For a detailed account of these and many other poets, see Ibid., L H P, i and ii, T F, i, 38-39, S P L, T S, and S A, Vol I

over Asia and their presence at Ghaznīn, highly prized by the Sultān, was responsible for raising the reputation of the Imperial patron to the highest water-mark. It is true that mystic ideas had not yet gained a wide currency and the Ghazal had not yet been invented; and that the poetry, though brilliant, was not deep, yet the Ghaznawid poets possessed, in spite of their short-comings, a certain amount of freshness and candour which the succeeding generations of poets have frequently lacked *

As a man of culture and refinement, endowed with an intuitive love of learning and an instinctive admiration for everything that is beautiful in art and literature, Mahmūd's magnanimity was not confined to literary sphere alone, but also found a most suitable expression in the establishment of such intellectual institutions as *maktab*s and *madrasah*s, mosques and monasteries, museums and libraries. He founded the celebrated "Celestial Bride"—a mosque of matchless beauty and grandeur—, built of marble and granite, at his capital and furnished with gold and silver lamps, candelabras, precious ornaments and costly carpets. This magnificent mosque was in that age "a wonder of the east"—a sobriquet which it richly deserved †. In the vicinity of this sacred structure the Sultān established a big university and provided it with a vast library and a fine museum. The library was stocked with numerous literary treasures in various languages and the museum enriched with invaluable antiquities. The mosque was surrounded by as many as 3,000 quarters meant for the residence of teachers and students of the university. The teachers were paid regular salaries and the students were granted stipends and scholarships from the State funds and the income of the mosque and its endowments.*

* See L H P, i, ii, S. A, i, and S P L

† T F, i, 30, and H I, 292

Sultān Mahmūd had a fine taste for architecture. ✓ He spent huge sums of money on the construction of magnificent monuments with a view to beautify his beloved Ghaznīn. He imported distinguished architects from distant countries and employed them in giving a suitable expression to his architectural designs. His example was followed by his nobles who vied with one another and even emulated their king in erecting superb edifices. The result was that Ghaznīn became a nucleus of Islamic architecture in Central Asia †

Among the public works of a vast and varied
Public Works description erected under the instructions of Sultān Mahmūd

* Tarikh-i-Ibn Khalkān, II, 86, T.F., I, 30, and H.I., 290

† T.F., I, 30, Indian as well as Persian architecture together—not one to the exclusion of the other—seems to have influenced Mahmūd's tastes for architecture. (See C.H.I., III, 574)

may be mentioned aqueducts, reservoirs, cisterns, porches, bridges and dams. The most prominent of all these were a market at Balkh, a bridge over the Oxus and the Band-i-Sultān across the river Nawar, about eighteen miles north of Ghaznīn. Of these only the last-named has survived and that too, though still in use, is much damaged *.

Unfortunately, however, the Ghaznīn of Ghaznīn Past these days is a complete contrast and Present to the Ghaznīn of the days of Sultān Mahmūd. Once the historic capital of the great Ghaznavid Empire and the cradle of Islamic culture, it is now a collection of kacha houses, wearing the appearance of an ordinary Afghān town of limited population. So complete in fact seems to have been the spoliation to which it was subjected by 'Alā-ud-Dīn Hussain, surnamed Jahānsuz or "world-burner", and later vandals that nothing but the tombs of a few kings, two towers of victory—one built by Mahmūd and the other by his son, Mas'ūd—, and the shrines of saints and savants have survived to give us an idea not so much of the glory that was Ghaznīn as of the misfortunes that befell it †.

* See Ghaznī in E.I.B., H.I.E.A., 494-97, and M.G., 166.

† For some details on the architectural remains at Ghaznīn, see my article under the caption "Impressions of Ghaznīn" in C & M.G., Lahore, dated the 1st September, 1938. Also see H.I.E.A., 494-97, C.H.I., III, 574-75, and E.B.

The tomb of Amir Subukugin is situated near the modern town of Ghaznī on the Kabul Ghaznī Road. It is built of white marble and has a small but beautiful dome over it. Its epitaph is in Kōsīc characters.* The Rauzah (tomb) of Sultan Mahmud is further up on an elevation, having a modest garden round it. It is also built of white marble and is crowned with a newly constructed dome. Its epitaph is in Kōsīc script invoking the mercy of God on the noblest Amir, the greatest king the Lord of Church and State, Abul Qāsim Mahmud bin Subukugin. The outer gate, with a long corridor to the right opening into the enclosure seems to be a later addition. The doors that formerly adorned the tomb are now to be seen in the Agra Fort, where they were removed by the British in 1842 A.C. They

* This tomb is not mentioned by any modern writer. Even Sir J. Marshall, Dr J. Ferguson and Dr M. Nazim are silent about it. All that they have said about in their works are the tombs of Mahmud and his son and the two towers of victory. None of the nobles but other than these finds place in any modern work known to me. Even the Encyclopædia Britannica does not go beyond referring to the above mentioned tombs and towers. The little that is mentioned about these too seems to be based on hearsay reports and is therefore full of mistakes and inaccuracies. Compare it with my account in "Impressions of Ghaznī", which is based on personal observations, and mark the mistakes.

† The village that has sprung up round the tomb is known as Rauzah-i-Sultān

are made of deodār wood, richly carved and containing beautiful inscriptions in Kūfic script * The tombs of three other kings, viz., Abdur Razzāq, Abdul Fateh and Ulughbeg, are also situated in the same neighbourhood. They are crowned with a common dome. The names of the three kings are inscribed on a tile of white marble, which is fixed in a wall of the domed structure. Both the tombs and the dome are in a dilapidated state.†

* Mas'ūd had raised a beautiful mausoleum over this tomb and created vast endowments for its maintenance (T M, 310) The tomb was held in such esteem by the people that even the 'world-incendiary', 'Alā-ud-Dīn Hussain, did not include it in the wholesale destruction of Ghaznī ordered by him "His tomb has however, suffered from the ravages of his Muslim admirers, who for ages have resorted to it for the purpose of seeking divine grace and have carried away to their homes fragments of wood or handfuls of earth as keep-sakes, from the sacrilege of the savage hordes of Hulāgū Khān, and in more recent times, from the misguided enthusiasm of Lord Ellenborough, who, believing that its gates were those of the temple of Somnāth, ordered them to be removed and brought back to India." (M G, 124, foot-note) "Once a grand edifice", the tomb became a cluster of "dilapidated ruins" later on and has been repaired and renovated by the Afghān Government only recently. It is no longer in "dilapidated ruins", as stated by Dr M Nāzīm (M G, 167 and 124, f n)

The legend that the gates of the tomb had been taken away by Mahmūd from Somnāth is devoid of historical foundation and is fantastically absurd (H I E A, 496, f n)

† Some scholars have omitted these tombs and mentioned those of Mas'ūd and Ibrāhīm, which I could not trace

MEDIÆVAL INDIA UNDER MUSLIM KINGS

700-7
VOLUME II

THE RISE AND FALL OF
THE GHAZNAWIDS

By

S. M. JAFFAR

Author of 'Education in Muslim India',
'*Some Cultural Aspects of Muslim
Rule in India*', '*The Mughal
Empire from Babar to Jawangzeb*',
etc

FIRST EDITION 1940

PESHAWAR CITY
(INDIA)

S. MUHAMMAD SADIQ KHAN
KISSA KHANI

Published by S Muhammad Sadiq Khan,
Khudadad Street, Peshawar City

Copyright
All rights of reproduction and
translation reserved by the author

Printed at The Empire (Elec) Press, Govt Printers, Sadar Road, Peshawar (N W R P)

DEDICATED
WITH PROFOUND LOVE AND RESPECT
TO SIR SHAFAT AHMAD KHAN, Kt.,
M A, LITT D, F R HIS SOC, ETC,
HEAD OF THE DEPARTMENT OF HISTORY,
UNIVERSITY OF ALLAHABAD, A VETERAN
HISTORIAN WHOSE ACTIVE INTEREST IN
THE CAUSE OF INDIAN HISTORY HAS
LED TO THE RISE AND GROWTH OF THE
MODERN SCHOOL OF INDIAN HISTORY
AND THE
INDIAN HISTORY
CONGRESS

CONTINIS

PICTURE

PP. viii-viii

APPENDIXES

PP. xiii-xv

CHAPTER I

THE EARLY GHAZNAVIDS

FROM ORIGIN TO SUBJECTION

Introduction — Alptegin — Billah and Tumän — Subakuchi — Causes of his and Qudrat-khan's Afghan — Indo-Afghan Alliance — Recession of Mgl in Indepen dence — Rapid invasion of Gzir in a.d. 870 — The branch of truth and punishment — Invasion of Subakuchi victory — Relation with the Samanid and Chinese and estinute of Subakuchi — his son. p. 1-2

CHAPTER II

SULTAN MAHMUD THE GREAT

CONQUESTS IN CENTRAL ASIA

Introductory — Early life of Mahmud — Struggle for Succession — Relation with Samanid — Dealing with Emperor of Turkestan — Conquest of Ghur — Invasion of Sogdiana — Conquest of Sistan — A usurper of ruler of Suf istan — Conquest of Ghur — Reduction of Qudrat — Conquest of the valley of Nyr and Qut — Expedition against M ghut — Invasion with Ziyadid and the rule of Mel — Conquest of Kavir, Hormuzan and Fasilan — pp. 23-48

THE GHAZNAWIDS

CHAPTER III SULTAN MAHMUD THE GREAT - II INVASIONS OF INDIA

Introductory - (1) Towns of Khyber Pass - (2) Peshawar - (3) Bhatiari - (4) Multan - (5) Bhatiari - (6) Punjab - Nagarkot - (7) Nurpur or Narayangpur - (8) Multan - (9) Thanesar - (10) Nandana - (11) Kashmir - (12) Panjab - (13) Kannauj and Kilinjar - (14) Punjab - (15) Gwalior and Kilinjar - (16) Somnath - (17) The islands of the Indus

pp. 49-53

CHAPTER IV SULTAN MAHMUD THE GREAT - III MOTIVES & RESULTS OF INDIAN INVASIONS

Introductory - Motives - Political factor - Economic factor - Religious force - Were Indian Invasion Just? - Protection of Islam - Extermination of Infidels? - Conquest or territorial annexation? - The impulsive motive behind and effect of Indian Invasions

pp. 54-60

CHAPTER V SULTAN MAHMUD THE GREAT - IV DEFENSIVE ACTIVITIES OF HIS PERIOD

CHAPTER VI

SULTAN MAHMUD THE GREAT — V SOME LEGENDS ABOUT HIM

Introductory — Legend of Firdausi (1) Information contradictions — (2) So rare secondary and devoid of authority — (3) Was Firdausi appointed by Mahmud to write the Shāh-nāmeh? — (4) Apocryphal authorship of the Shāh-nāmeh — The Slave — Charge of bastards — Mahmud and Avi — The Idol of Somrath — Story of two Dibsh lines
pp. 12^o 160

CHAPTER VII

SULTAN MAHMUD THE GREAT — VI CLOSING DAYS, CHARACTER AND ESTIMATE

Introductory — His illness and death — Review of riches and expression of sorrow — Beginning of the end — Mahmud's character — His personal appearance — His virtues — His religious beliefs and piety — As a soldier and a general — As a king — Mahmud's weaknesses — His estimate
pp. 161 182

CHAPTER VIII

SULTAN MASUD I

Introductory — The war of succession — Releasement and reinstatement of Mu'mandī — Execution of Hissank — Appointment of new Wazir — Conquest of Mekrin and Kirmān — Revolts of Ali ud-Daulah and Majd ud-Daulah — Recovery and loss of Khwarizm — Jurjan and Tabaristan — Condition of Indir — Tihk's rise — Capture of Hānsī and Sonpat — Campaign against Silhāq — Flight to Indir — The Wazirat department under Masud — Patronage of learning and promotion of education — Character and estimate of Masud
pp. 182 212

CHAPTER IX

SULTAN MAUDUD & HIS SUCCESSORS

Maudūd — Appointment of Wazirs and Governor of the Punjab — Recovery of Transoxiana — Condition of India — Campaign against the Saljuqs — Abū Ja'far Ma'sūd II — Abul Hasan 'Alī — 'Abdur Rashīd — Tughral 'the Ingrate' — Farrukhzād — Ibrāhīm Mas'ūd III — Sherzād and Arslān Shāh — Bahrām Shāh — Rebellion of Indian Governor — War with Ghurid Maliks — Progress of learning and education — Khusrau Shāh — Khusrau Malik

pp 213 236

CHAPTER X

THE GHAZNAWID GOVERNMENT

Introductory — The nature and functions of government — Toleration — Absence of the Law of Succession — The Central Government — Diwān i-Wizārat — Diwān i 'Arz — The Army — Gradation of army officers — Diwān i-Risālat — Diwān-i Shughl-i-Ishrāf i-Mamlukat — Diwān i Wikālat — Mazālim — Diwān i Muhtasib — Diwān i Mumlikat i Khās — Sāhib i-Barid — Khāzān — Provincial Government — Administration of cities — Government Service — How India was governed — Revenue System — Taxes and other sources of revenue — Famine Relief — Cultural Progress

pp 237-64

INDEX

pp 265 ff

ABBREVIATIONS

(These abbreviations are used only in respect of works which have been frequently cited in this volume. Works rarely referred to are excluded from this list, for their names and those of their authors are given in full in the foot-notes at their proper places)

- A A Al-Mukhtasar fi Akhbar-il-Bashar (Cairo edition), by Abul Fida
- A G I Ancient Geography of India, by A Cunningham
- A S I Archaeological Survey of India (Annual Reports)
- B I S Bibliotheca Indica Series of R A S B
- B M British Museum
- C H I Cambridge History of India, The, Volume III, edited by Sir W Haig
- C G K Coins of Ghazni Kings, by E. Thomas
- C M Chahar Maqāla, by Nizāmī-al-‘Arūzī al-Samarqandī, edited by Maulvī Ghulām Muhammad Abūhārī
- C O C Collection of Oriental Coins in B M
- E B Encyclopædia Britannica, The
- En of Is Encyclopædia of Islām, edited by T Houtsma and others
- E & D Elliot and Dowson's History of India as told by its own historians
- E M I Education in Muslim India, by S M Jaffar
- G D A M I Geographical Dictionary of Ancient and Mediæval India, by N L Dey
- G I Gates of India, The, by Sir T Holdich
- G M S Gibb Memorial Series
- H I History of India, The, by M Elphinstone

- H J E A History of Indian and Eastern Architecture, by J Fergusson
- I A Isād an Antiquary, The
- I G I Imperial Gazetteer of India, The
- I K. Ibn Khaldūn's Kitāb ul-İoār translated into Urdu by Maulvī Hakīm Ahmad Hussain
- J. H Jawāmi'-ul-Hikāyāt, by Awfi
- J. R A S Journal of the Royal Asiatic Society of Great Britain and Ireland
- J A S B Journal of the (Royal) Asiatic Society of Bengal
- J T Jāmi'-ut-Tawārikh, by Rishīd ud-Dīn
- K T al-Kāmil fit-Tawārikh, by Allāmā Ibn-ul-Asīr, edited by Tornberg
- L E C Lands of the Eastern Caliphate, The, by G Le Strange
- L H P Literary History of Persia, The, by L G Browne
- M F Mahmūd wa Firdausī, by Qazī 'Abdus Samad
- M G Muhammad of Ghazna The Life and Times of Sultan, by M Natim
- M I Medieval India, The History of, by Ishwari Prasad
- Milrā'i The Milrā'i of Sind and its Tributaries, by H G Raverty in J A S B
- M Z Murūj-uz-Zalāḥ, by Abul Hasan 'Alī ibn Husayn al-Mas'ūdī translated into English by A Sprenger
- N K P Neeral Kirshor Press (Lucknow)
- O H I Oxford History of India, The by V A Smith
- P P U T Politics in Pre-Mughal Times, by Ishwari Tora
- R S Rauzat us Safā, by Mīr Khwānd (N K P)

S A	Shur-ul-Ajam , by Allāma Shibli No'mānī
Sachau	E C Sachau's translation of Alberūnī's Tāhqīq ma'lil Hind under the title 'Alberūnī's India'
S A M A	Some Aspects of Muslim Administration by R P Tripathi
S C A M R I	Some Cultural Aspects of Muslim Rule in India , by S M Jaffar
S I M H	Studies in Indo Muslim History , by S H Hodivala
S M G	Sultān Mahmūd of Ghaznīn , by M Habib
S N	Sīvāsat-Nāmah , by Nizām-ul Mulk, edited by Schefer
S P L	Studies in Persian Literature , by Hādī Hasan
T A	Tabqāt-i-Akbārī , by Nizām-ud Dīn Ahmad (N K P)
T B	Tārīkh-i-Baihaqī , by Abul Fazl Baihaqī
T F	Tārīkh-i-Ferishta (Gulshan-i-Ibrāhīm) , by Abul Qāsim Ferishta, (N K P)
T G	Tārīkh-i-Guzidah , by Hamdullah Mastaufī (G M S)
T H	Tārīkh-i-Hindūstān , by Shams ul-Ulamā Dr Muhammad Zakāullah Khān
T M	Tārīkh-i-Mas'ūdi , by Abul Fazl Muhammad Hussain al-Baihaqī, edited by Morley
T N	Tabqāt-i-Nāsīrī , by Mīnhāj us-Sirāj Juz jānī. (B I S)
T S	Tazkarat-ush Shu'arā , by Amīr Daulat Shāh Samarqandī
T Y	Tārīkh-i-Yamīnī (Kitāb ul-Yamīnī) , by Muhammad bin Muhammad al-Utbī
Z A	Zīā-ul-Akhbār , by 'Abdul Haī bin Az-Zuhāk bin Mahmūd al-Gardīzī, edited by M Nāzīm

CHAPTER I

THE EARLY GHANIWIDS

FROM ALPTIGIN TO SUBLAKTIGIN

The Arabs were the first Muslim conquerors of India, but they did not carry their conquests far beyond the Indus. Even in Sind their rule did not endure long and they left no lasting legacy behind except that a large part of the population of that place became Muslim in faith. After a period of about two centuries that elapsed after the Arab occupation of Sind, India presented a scene of confusion. A mere geographical expression or a conglomeration of small states, without a paramount power at the centre, showing no signs of national unity — she was rent up by dynastic jealousies and internecine warfare, so much so that even in the event of a common danger the people would not offer a united front. It was on this India that the avalanche of Turkish invasions from the North-West broke and eventually changed the course of her history. After the conquest of the country, the Muslim rulers of India set themselves sedulously to the task of establishing law and order and building up on that foundation an empire capable of protecting the people and opening up new avenues for the advance of their intellect. In the train of Muslim warriors and war-lords came Muslim saints and scholars, poets and philosophers, who permeated the ranks of Indian society and tried to give India that cultural unity without which political solidarity could not be achieved.

When the 'Abbāsid Khilāfat began to decline in power and prestige, the governors of the far-flung provinces declared their independence. One of them, Ismā'il by name, Sāmānid by tribe and Tartar by origin, seized upon Khurāsān, Transoxiana and Afghānistān in 872 A C and fixed his capital at Bukhārā, where he founded the Sāmānid Dynasty, which remained in the saddle for more than a century. His son and successor, Ahmad, had a Turkish slave, named Alptigīn, whom he enrolled in his body-guard. Manumitted by the next king, Nasr bin* Ahmad, and entrusted with the command of some troops by his successor, Nūh bin Nasr, Alptigīn rose from that rank to one of Hājib-ul-Hujjāb and acquired immense power and influence after his victory over Bakr bin Malik, the commander of the troops of Khurāsān, in 956 A C. Under the patronage of his youthful master, 'Abdul-Malik, he rose to be the governor of Khurāsān by dint of his ability and industry. On the death of 'Abdul Malik when he was consulted about the appointment of his successor, he voted against Mansūr, the brother of the deceased king. Mansūr having been elected by other Amīrs, the life of Alptigīn was in danger, and government of the territories conquered by him. The places which next felt the force of Alptigin's arms were Bust and a part of the kingdom of Kābul, which were attacked and occupied. After that he led some expeditions against the neighbouring chiefs, defeated the Afghāns of the Khyber Pass and Peshāwar valley and established his authority there. But for the fact that he had a very brief reign, he would have considerably extended the area of his kingdom. He passed away in September, 963 A.C. after a successful reign of about eight months.* He was a just, wise and vigorous ruler.

* Bin, an Arabic word, means 'son of'

Alptigin was succeeded by his son, Abū

Bilkātīgīn and Pīrī Is-hāq, but not before he had defeated Abū 'Alī son of Abū Bahr Lawik, who had driven him out. On his death three distinguished generals of the late king occupied the throne of Ghaznīn one after the other. The first was Bilkātīgīn who is said to have been a very pious, brave and justice-loving man. The second was Pīrī (Pīrtīgīn) who turned out to be 'a great villain'. The reign of this ruler is remarkable for the first clash between Muslims and Hindūs in the vicinity of Ghaznīn. It is narrated that the disaffected people of Ghaznīn, who worked for his overthrow and plotted for his deposition, requested Abū 'Alī Lawik to make common cause with the Shāh of Kābul and put an end to the rule of

* See p. 5, note, and M.G., 24-27 and 175-76

Pirītigīn the tyrant. The allies marched against Ghaznīn from their respective places Subuktigīn, the third general of Alptigīn and a seasoned soldier, fell upon Abū 'Aīl Lawīk with a body of 500 Turks and inflicted a sharp defeat and heavy losses on him. The Hindūs, who were advancing under the son of their Shāh (king of Kābul) for seizing Ghaznīn, were successfully repulsed and routed by Pirītigīn. It has been correctly remarked by Sir W Haig that it was "the first conflict in this region between Hindūs and Muslims the former being the aggressors".* Pirītigīn was deposed on account of his unpopularity and then the third general, i.e., Subuktigīn, was raised to the throne.†

* C H I m 11

† Some historians have only ignored while others have altogether denied the existence of Bilkātigīn and Pirītigīn (Pirī) which is proved by documentary as well as numismatic evidence. The regnal dates of these two kings as well as of their predecessor and successor are different in different accounts. This has led to a heated controversy among modern scholars who have advanced various arguments in support of their respective theories. Raverty wrote a fairly long note on the subject and maintained that Alptigīn ruled for cigl⁺ years and died in 352 A. H., that his son Is-hāq, who succeeded him, remained in power till 355 A. H., that Bilkātigīn, who succeeded Is-hāq, ruled for eight years and died in 362 A. H., and that Pirī (Pirītigīn) came next and occupied the throne till 367 A. H., when he was defeated and deposed by Subuktigīn (Vide Raverty's translation of T. A., 71-73). Recently Dr Muhammad Nāzīm took up the question again and, after reshuffling the evidence

Subuktigin was originally a descendant of Subuktigin Yazd-Jird, the last Sāsānid king of Persia, who had been deposed and whose kingdom had been included in the commonwealth of Islām during the Khilafat of Usmān. After the conquest of Persia the members of its royal family do not seem to have seen better days for at least five generations, for we are informed that Subuktigin, who was sixth in descent from Yazd-Jird, was taken from Turkistān to Buksārā and sold to Alptigīn by a merchant named Nāṣir the Hājī. All that we know about his early life is that he was hitherto available tried to close the controversy for good. His conclusions are that Alptigīn conquered Ghaznīn about Zil hūj 351 A.H. after a siege of about four months and died after a reign of eight months (not years, as is erroneously said by many, including Rivers) in the month of Shāban, 352 A.H., that his son, Abū Is-haq, succeeded him, but not before he had suffered a defeat and exile at the hands of Abū 'Abī (son of Abū Bakr) Lālik and recovered his kingdom from him after inflicting a defeat on him on the 27th of Shārwāl, 354 A.H. that Is-haq died on the 25th of Zil qī'd, 355 A.H., that Bilkūtīn ruled for eight or nine years (355-364 A.H.), and that Pīrī (Pīritigīn) remained in power for two or three years (364-366 A.H.). See M.G., 24-27 and 175-176.

* See T.F. Vol. i, p. 18, T.N. (Cal ed 1864), p. 6, and I.K., II, vii, 256 ff (translator's note). It may be noted here that Subuktigin was not a born slave. When the fortunes of his family had fallen to their lowest ebb, he was sold by one and purchased by another. Many a man of noble birth, including mighty monarchs, has often suffered this fate. Slavery, moreover, is not an inherent weakness. It is something imposed. Finally, a slave is as good a man in Islām as any other follower of it.

born about the year 331 A H (= 942-43 A C), that his father Jūq, was the chieftain of a minor principality in Turkistān and was renowned for his unusual physical strength, that at the age of twelve his father's principality was raided by a hostile laskar and he was carried away by the raiders, and that he was kept as a prisoner for four years and then sold to Nasr the Hājī, who took him to Bukhārā and sold him to Alptigin. Impressed by the abilities of the promising youth, Alptigin treated him with great kindness and entrusted him with responsible posts, and it must be said to the credit of the latter that he fully justified the confidence reposed in him by the former. His devotion to the descendants of his master cannot be called in question. He served them with unmixed loyalty and enjoyed their confidence and favours till he was elevated to kingship by the people in accordance it is said with the will of Alptigin and married to his daughter*. Not content with what he had, he united the various clans of Afghānistān into a nation and conquered Lamghān and Sistān with their help and extended his sway right up to Khurāsān, and turned his kingdom

* Authorities are not in agreement on this point. In view of the fact that Subuktigin was the fourth in the line of succession (the first 3 being Is-hiq, Bilkatigin and Piritigin) it may be said that the will was not made at all, or if at all it was made, it must have remained a dead letter, for it was not acted upon for a long time for some reason or the other.

into a well-organized and prosperous state

When Subuktigīn ascended the throne, Bust

Conquest
of Bust

was occupied by Tughān One of the Sāmānid adventurers expelled him from his stronghold

and occupied it Tughān requested Subuktigīn
for help and agreed to acknowledge the Amir
as his overlord after the recovery of Bust
Subuktigīn took up his cause and, after inflicting
a defeat on his rival, restored him to his lost possession After restoration, however, he became lukewarm in owing allegiance His
delay in remitting the promised tribute to Ghaznī and the Amir's insistence on it led to
a scuffle, in which the latter sustained an injury
at the hands of his vassal But for the timely intervention of his servants, Tughān's career
would have been cut short He took to flight
and sought shelter in Kurmaj, from where he never returned Bust was occupied without encountering opposition and the Sāmānid Chief's Dabir (secretary) Abul Fateh, who had been living in retirement, was brought before the Amir
who treated him with great kindness in recognition of his wide learning and proficiency in arts The
learned recluse, it is said, was offered an important post, which he occupied till the death of the Amir, but later he fell out with Mahmūd and
went away to Turkistān *

* T F, i, 19, and T H, i, 256

Afghāns who migrated to the border-land between India and Afghānistān and colonized in the territory which comprised Kurmaj, Peshawar and Shūrān. This colonization was viewed with grave concern and resented by Jaipāl, the Hindū Rāja of Wāihind, who scented danger from the Afghāns. Some skirmishes followed and pitched battles were also fought, but nothing decisive was accomplished by either party.^{*}

Sometime later the Rāja incurred the displeasure of the Hindū Gakhars who joined hands with their neighbours, the Afghāns, and formed alliances with them against him. Cowed down by this combination, Jaipāl made peace with the Afghāns and also ceded a number of towns from Lamghān to Afghānistān to them for colonization on the condition that they would protect India against all Muslim invasions from beyond. For sometime this policy proved quite effective and the Afghāns defended the Indian frontier well and even checked the Sāmānid advances for Indian booty. Thus India enjoyed immunity from external invasions as a result of the Indo-Afghan alliance. But conditions changed abruptly when the Ghaznawids sprang into power and prominence.

* It is stated that when the belligerents withdrew to their respective places, the people of Kābul and Khalj replied, when inquired about the fate of Musalmāns and the state of affairs in Kohistān, that Kohistān should henceforth be called Afghānistān (i.e. habitat of afghān or noise) because afghān (noise) reigned supreme there. Thus, according to Ferishta, the people are called Afghāns and the place inhabited by them Afghānistān. (T F, 1, 17)

Recognition
of Afghan
independence

Alptigin led a number of expeditions against the Afghans and harassed them so much that they could not but seek the aid of the Indian Raja against him. The Raja responded to their request with scant courtesy and treated the frontier problem with indifference. After consulting the Raja of Bhātiya,¹ he disposed of by handing over to the Afghans the territory inhabited by them so that they might establish their own kingdom which might serve as a buffer state. Thus for the first time did the Afghans have an independent government in their own country. The indifference and aloofness of the Raja, who did not want to meddle in frontier affairs, coupled with the political pressure that was brought to bear upon the Afghans by the Ghaznawid ruler Shaikh Hamid, the Afghan ruler of the Frontier, made peace with Subuktigin and agreed to pursue a policy of neutrality in so far as India was concerned Political expediency, coupled, perhaps, with religious considerations, prompted Subuktigīn to agree to the proposal and enter into an alliance with the Afghāns He scored a brilliant point in that the Afghān blockade, which impeded his advance into India and acted as a stumbling block in his way, was removed with one stroke of political sagacity And, for the Afghāns, it was a question of life and death Their political existence was in danger It was ensured as soon as they made peace with the Ghaznavids and formed an alliance with them Henceforth they ceased to bother themselves about the safety of India Subuktigīn gave them many concessions and won their sympathies and thus cleared his own path to India *

* Various names such as Bhātner, Bhātinda, Bhāwālpur, Uchch and Bheri have been advanced as possible identifications of Bhātiya, but none except Bheri can stand the 'crucial test of strategical considerations'. Professor Hodivala has put forward some sound reasons in favour of Bheri (See S I M H, 138-39). Dr M Nizam prefers Bhātinda. For his discussion on the subject, vide M G, 197 ff. I am inclined in favour of Bhera.

The rise of a powerful kingdom under a Muslim monarch in the vicinity of the Indus must have most naturally disturbed Jaipāl's peace of mind and created fears and misgivings in his heart, especially when his dominions lay contiguous to those of his rival, Subuktigīn The recognition of that kingdom spelt the negation of his political suzerainty He had but two alternatives before him either to arrest the rising tide of the Ghaznavid power or to forego his claims to political supremacy and risk the political existence of his own kingdom He decided to follow the first course,

*Jaipāl's invasion
of Ghaznī and
his defeat*

and despite the opposition and protestations of the 'whole council, both Brahmans and KshatriIs,' he made preparations and mobilized his forces against his ambitious neighbour. The first great clash between the armies of Islām and those of Hindūism took place at Lamghān in the Khyber Pass." It was accompanied by a violent storm, rain and thunder, which the superstitious ascribed to supernatural causes, calculated to cause their destruction, so much

* Some modern scholars, (e.g. Dr I. Topr,) aver, without assigning any reasons, that the fight did not take place. They give credit to the Rījī for his 'warlike mentality' and say that he was quite prepared for the fight, but changed his mind at Ghaznīn. How he could go so far as Ghaznīn without fighting a battle and then suddenly change his mind and enter into a humiliating treaty is not explained (See Politics in Pre-Mughal Times, by Dr Ishwari Topr, pp. 28-29). It may also be noted here that in this clash also the Hindus were the aggressors.

† The phenomenon of storm, rain and thunder, referred to above, is said to have been the direct result of Mahmūd's throwing a filthy thing in a clean fountain of water, haunted by spirits. This tale of wonder, is preserved in the Tārikh-i Yamīn, Tārikh-i-Ferishta and other historical works, as a relic of the past. To be brief, it is said that there was a clean fountain of water which became tumultuous and gave rise to black clouds, thunders and snow storms whenever a filthy matter was thrown in it, that Mahmūd, son of Subuktigīn, who was aware of its qualities, caused it to be polluted, and that the results produced caused consternation in the Hindu army who believed that their gods had become angry with them and therefore sent snow-storms etc. for punishing them. This 'tale of wonder' would at once remind the

so that Jaipal himself stood aghast at the horrible sight and saw safety in submission. He sued for peace and his request was accepted. According to the peace treaty that was concluded, the Rājā agreed to the following conditions—(1) to pay an indemnity of one million dirhams, (2) to deliver fifty elephants, (3) to cede some cities and fortresses situated in his kingdom, (4) to accept the appointment of some officers in India by Subuktigin and (5) to keep some of reader of a number of similar stories, such as the 'miraculous pitcher', 'the lake of wonder' and 'the well of wonder'. It records the survival of an ancient superstition, according to which Nāgas, &c., demons or dragons—half-human and half brute—residing in such natural reservoirs as springs, fountains, wells and lakes, got offended when anything dirty was thrown in them and poured forth their wrath in the form of such phenomena as tempests, whirlwinds, clouds and snow-storms. It is told by the Buddhist travellers such as Fa Hien and Hiuen Tsing; and the contemporary Muslim traveller, Alberuni, had also heard of a well in the hills of Farghānā, which was haunted by spirits endowed with supernatural powers. The phenomenon that caused consternation in Jupāl's army must have been similar to that which destroyed the Anglo Indian army in 1842 A.C.—a snow-storm, and the story that the gods of the Hindus had got annoyed with them seems to have been set up with a view to frighten the Hindu soldiers who had a firm faith not only in supernatural but also in unnatural and even anti-natural causes, and who felt sure that their gods were really angry with them. For references to the tale of wonder vide Tārikh-i-Yamīn in E & D, ii, 20, T F i, 19, Dr Sachau's translation of the Asār ul Bāqīya, 235, and S I.M.H.

his relatives with Subuktigīn as hostages until the indemnity was paid

Historians are unanimous on the point that when Jaipāl returned safely to His breach of faith and punishment his capital and found himself secure from external danger, he thought that the treaty could be set at naught at his own sweet will. Behaving in a Kautilyan fashion and regarding the terms of the treaty as a scrap of paper to be torn to pieces, he not only refused to abide by them but also threw into prison the officers whom Subuktigīn had left to see that the Rāja lived up to his words. This brazen breach of faith drew down upon him the wrath of the Ghaznawid overlord who marched against him in order to punish him for his perfidy.* Jaipāl was not idling away his time. He had, in the meantime, prepared himself for the inevitable and enlisted the support of the Rājas of Delhi, Ajmer, Kālinjar and Kānaūj. He set out to receive the Afghān army with his hordes of Hindūs. In the engagement that was

* At first Subuktigīn did not believe the news of Jaipāl's betrayal and, therefore, paid no heed to it. According to 'Utbī, it was only when he was convinced by the repeated accounts' that he had been defrauded and bamboozled that he marched against Jaipāl to punish him for his 'wickedness' and 'infidelity'.

† T. F., 1, 20. It is, however, contended that Ajmer was not yet founded. It is said to have been founded in 1100 A. C. (Indian Antiquary, xxxvi, 162)

fought on the bank of the Indus, the allies suffered a crushing defeat. After victory, Subuktigīn levied heavy contributions on the neighbouring districts, received assurances from the Rāja that he would remit tribute regularly to Ghaznīn and amassed immense booty, including 200 war elephants. Leaving Peshāwar under the command of a trusted officer and putting 10,000 horse at his disposal, the victor marched back to his native Ghaznīn.

Importance of Subuktigīn's victory Politically considered, the result of this invasion was that a mighty Hindū confederacy was defeated and the superiority of the Musalmāns over the Hindūs was established, and though India was not yet conquered, the right route to attack her was discovered, for Subuktigīn was the first Muslim king who invaded India from the North-West Frontier. It may also be noted here that in the first clash between Subuktigīn and Jaiḍāl, the latter was the aggressor and the second was the direct outcome of his breach of faith.*

Relations with the Sāmānid overlord When Subuktigīn ascended the throne of Ghaznīn the Sāmānid power was on the wane and the Kingdom of Bukhārā was in the throes of disintegration. Amir Nūh, the Sāmānid King, was hemmed in by insurgents on all sides and the governors of the outlying provinces were in constant rebellion All this afforded a most favourable opportunity to an ambitious leader for the realization of his ambitions, and the Amir of Ghaznī could have successfully fished in the troubled waters Far from betraying his overlord he continued to acknowledge him as such and gave ample proof of his loyalty and devotion by lending him a helping hand against his enemies When Abū 'Alī Sīmjūrī* and Fā'iq, two seasoned intriguers joined hands against their overlord, Amir Nūh, the latter called in the aid of Subuktigīn, who was ever ready to help him in his hours of need In response to his request Subuktigīn set out with his forces and reached Herāt, where the insurgents had mustered in strength He opened negotiations with Abū Ali and Fā'iq and proved himself a good peace-maker by prevailing upon them to make peace with their overlord and to pay him an indemnity of 15,000,000 dīrhams Not long afterwards, however, Abū 'Alī violated the terms of the peace-treaty and Subuktigīn took the field against him in person, firmly determined to punish him for his perfidy The rebel put up a vigorous opposition, but a timely attack, delivered by Mahmūd decided the day against him When defeated and driven to despair,

* T F, i, 27, and C H I, iii, 12

* Sir W Haig calls him Abū 'Alī Sunjūr, which is without authority and hence incorrect (C H I, iii, 12)

he fled to Ray and found shelter with Fakhr ud-Daulah The victorious father and son, viz., Subuktigīn and Mahmūd, triumphantly entered Herāt, where they were accorded a right royal reception by the grateful Amīr of Bukhārā Amīr Nūh rewarded the services of Subuktigīn by conferring upon him the government of Balkh and the title of *Nāsir-ud-Dīn-waa-Daulah and those of his son, Mahmūd, by bestowing upon him the command of the troops of Khurāsān and the title of Saif-ud-Daulah. When Mahmūd entered Nishāpur he was taken by surprise by the forces of Abū 'Alī Sīmjūrī and Fā'iq and the town was occupied by them. After this reverse Mahmūd retreated to Herāt and reorganized his forces there. When Subuktigīn learnt of this disaster, he marched post-haste and attacked Abū 'Alī Sīmjūrī. Again a timely attack delivered by Mahmūd decided the day in his favour. Fed up with fruitless struggles and humiliated by repeated reverses, both Abū 'Alī and his friend, Fā'iq, made pourparlers for peace to Amīr Nūh. When their ambassadors reached Bukhārā, the Amīr threw into prison the one sent by Fā'iq and received with marked respect the one sent by Abū 'Alī. This was done with a view to breaking down their combination. When Fā'iq learnt of the fate of his ambassador, he

* Subuktigīn already enjoyed the title of Mu'in ud-Daulah (Vide Sachao The Chronology of Ancient Nations, p 130)

fled to Ilak Khān and sought his interference, while Abū Alī was taken prisoner on his arrival at Bukhārā and made over to Subuktigīn for safe custody. Meanwhile Fā'iq had prevailed upon Ilak Khān to launch an attack on Bukhārā. When Nūh heard of the impending invasion of Bukhārā by Ilak Khān, he again invoked the assistance of Subuktigīn. Ever willing to furnish proof of his fidelity, the Amīr of Ghaznī set out at the head of his army to the help of his overlord. On reaching Bukhārā, however, he found that Amīr Nūh had changed his mind and was not prepared to meet the invader under the advice of his minister, 'Abdullah bin Muhammad bin Uzair. But for this, he would have plunged himself into a decisive war against Ilak Khān. He too, however, now made peace with Ilak Khān and ceded all the Sāmānid territory to the east of Qatwān to him. At the same time he also sent his son, Mahmūd, to Bukhārā at the head of 20 000 horse to bring about the dismissal of the cowardly Vazīr, Abdullah. Frightened out of his wits, Amīr Nūh dismissed 'Abdullah and appointed another Vazīr nominated by Subuktigīn. A little later when Subuktigīn and Mahmūd were both away from Khurāsān, 'Abul Qāsim, brother of Abū Alī Sīmjūrī, availed himself of their absence and occupied Nishāpur without encountering much opposition. His success was, however, short-lived, for he had to eva-

cuate the place on the arrival of Mahmūd and his uncle, Bughrājuq,* from Herāt

Amidst these transactions, at the height of Character & his power, Subuktigīn, who was estimate of exhausted by the strain and stress Subuktigīn of ceaseless war and conquest, sank and quietly passed away in 997 A C, bequeathing a fairly large and well-organized kingdom to his son, Mahmūd. He was a brave, righteous and upright ruler, who combined in his person the qualities of a soldier and a statesman. He ruled his kingdom with great prudence, justice and moderation for full twenty years. He has gone down in history as an Amīr-i-'Adl or Just Ruler, who was adored and obeyed by his soldiers, whose sufferings he shared, and loved and respected by his subjects, whose interests he always tried to promote. His loyalty and devotion to the Sāmānid King, whom he acknowledged as his suzerain, stand in dramatic contrast to the treason and treachery of the Bukhāran nobility in relation to their overlord and reflects great credit on his character. Towards the close of his reign he had grown so strong that foreign potentates eagerly sought his friendship. He was a really great lover of learning and an equally great patron of the learned. His advice to his son Mahmūd, who rose to be one of the greatest patrons of literature,

* Vide T Y , 75-107, T M , 235 , Z A p , 58, T N , 75 , and M G , 30-32

is particularly interesting. He told him to conquer the hearts of the literary luminaries of his kingdom by looking after their welfare and carrying out their wishes, pointing out that his generosity in this sphere would immortalize his name.* The treatment meted out by him to Abul Fateh, the Dabir of the Sāmānid Chief, after the expulsion of Tughān from Bust is a glowing tribute to his patronage of learning.† Later Muslim historians have tried to represent him as a champion of Islām whose principal occupation was to wage wars with the infidels of India and to propagate his religion with fire and sword despite the fact that he 'never crossed the Indus and led only two expeditions against the Hindus'. His hands were too full of affairs at home to allow him time to draw out his sword and propagate Islām in India at its point. It was only on two occasions that he had to fight the Hindus of India and that too for political reasons. The first of his Indian expeditions was undertaken when he was attacked by Rāja Jaipāl of Lāhore and the second when the Rāja proved perfidious and violated the terms of the treaty solemnly entered into after his defeat in the first expedition. Sir W. Haig is perfectly right in saying that 'these expeditions were undertaken rather as measures of reprisal and for the purpose of securing

* T. F., i, 31

† See supra, p. 8

his dominions than with any intention of propagating the faith'* There is absolutely no doubt that as a good Muslim he was profoundly interested in the cause of Islām, but it will be too much to credit him with what he never did or attempted to do He did not propagate Islām in India at the point of the sword In fact he did not propagate it there even by peaceful means Apart from the fact that his sway was confined only to a fringe of the Indian Continent, the rest of which remained untouched by him, his political pre-occupations left him but little leisure to do so This is the verdict of history

From the preceding account it is evident that about the end of the 10th century the Ghaznawid Empire was in the making The Ghaznawids, with the solitary exception of Alptigīn, the founder of the dynasty, were gradually exerting themselves and asserting their authority in the name of the Sāmānid King Their motives were political and economic and not religious—creation of an independent empire of their own and its maintenance and not the propagation of Islām and its principles and practices in India They had but one end in view, i.e., political aggrandizement, and they laboured to achieve it by all legitimate means The Sāmānid name and authority served their purpose well and they

* C H I , iii, 12

exploited these words fully to their best advantage Under this political cloak the Ghaznawid power expanded unseen and without exciting jealousies or awakening rivalry The main object of the growing Ghaznawid State was to strengthen itself and to cement its foundations and to develop itself into a powerful empire It was for purely political considerations that the Ghaznawid rulers acknowledged the suzerainty of the Sāmānid King, otherwise they had little regard for him or for his power and prestige This is borne out by the fact that they freed themselves from the nominal political tutelage of the Sāmānid Sovereignty the moment they felt themselves strong enough to curb the opposition of their enemies The foundations of the great Ghaznawid Empire were laid by Subuktigīn and the splendid superstructure was raised by his more famous son and successor, Mahmūd, under whom it became a living force, a real symbol of power and a sure sign of authority

CHAPTER II

SULTAN MAHMUD THE GREAT — I HIS CONQUESTS IN CENTRAL ASIA

Mahmud is really the first remarkable figure in the history of Muslim India to claim our serious attention. Introductory He was the real maker of the Ghaznawid State and the first Muslim conqueror of a considerable part of India. Under him the semi-independent State of Ghaznīn rose to a full-fledged and fully developed Ghaznawid Empire. He picked up the policy of his father, pursued it with prudence and carried it to its logical conclusion. Though it is only in a limited sense that he can be regarded as a ruler of India, yet the work he did and the ground he prepared for the establishment of a Muslim empire in India cannot be ignored, and it is mainly in this capacity that he deserves a prominent place in Indian history.

Abul Qāsim Mahmūd was the eldest son of Subuktigin from his wife who was the daughter of an Imir of Zābulistān.* In spite of the efforts of his historians medieval as well as modern,

* S. N. 108, T. I., 1, 23 and T. G., 395. It is for this reason that Mahmud was also known as 'Mahmud-i-Zabuli'.

the early life of this mighty monarch of his age still remains wrapped in obscurity. A few stray facts bearing on the subject are known and they will not be out of place here. He was born on the night between the 1st and 2nd of November, 971 A.C.* He received his early education on orthodox lines under the tuition of a learned man. Well-grounded in various branches of Islamic literature, he knew the Holy Qurān by heart and was fully conversant with Muslim law and Tradition. His father was particularly keen about the education of his children. He himself had instructed Mahmūd in the science of statecraft and crystallized its principles, as propounded by himself, into a Pand-Nāmah. Mahmūd, moreover, seems to have undergone a regular course of apprenticeship in the art of administration. We find him acting as a deputy of his father during his absence from Ghaznīn. He was hardly seven years of age at that time. Later he was entrusted with the government of the province of Zamin-Dāwar. He was given a regular training in the military arts and sciences of his day His skill and proficiency as a swordsman, lance-fighter and marksman were par excellence As a constant companion of his father in his military expeditions, he had picked up experience, which proved so useful in his career of conquest We have had occasions to meet him as a lieutenant of his father on a number of battle-fields During his boyhood he gave a good account of his military genius by successfully conducting a punitive expedition against Ghūr He acquitted himself creditably in a battle that took place between his father and Jaipāl near Lamghān in 986-87 A C As a result, perhaps, of some court intrigue, he fell out with his father and was thrown into prison This estrangement was, however, short-lived The misunderstanding was soon removed and Mahmūd was restored to filial favours Mahmūd's services to the Sāmānid King against Abū 'Alī Simjūrī and Fā'iq, in conjunction with his father, have been dealt with and need not be dilated upon here * He was at Nishāpur and in the 26th year of his life when he heard the sad news of the death of his father †

* Historians have spun some strange stories round the birth of Mahmūd. For instance, at one place it is recorded that his birth 'synchronized with the falling down of an idol-temple at Waihand, and that shortly before his birth Subuktigīn saw in a dream a tree issuing out of the chafing-dish in his room and spreading out rapidly so as to overshadow the whole world, thus presaging the future iconoclast and conqueror' (M.G., 34, note 3, T.F., 1, 23, and T.N., 76). Such stories are not peculiar to the case of Mahmūd. Similar stories are told about the birth of Alexander the Great (See Plutarch's Lives, II, p. 104).

In accordance with the will made by Subuktigīn a few days before his death, the nobles of Balkh raised his younger son, Ismā'il, to the throne and proclaimed him as their

Struggle for Succession

* See supra, pp 16 ff

† See M G, 34 ff

king. With a view to strengthening his position, the new king did homage to his Sāmānid overlord and to win the good-will of the army he lavishly distributed wealth among his soldiers. There was, however, a party of the people who believed that fitness to rule was the first and foremost qualification for succession to the throne. That party espoused the cause of Mahmūd, who was the elder and decidedly the abler and more energetic of the two brothers. Mahmūd, who was no less ambitious than Ismāīl, refused to acquiesce in the settlement. He wrote a letter of condolence to his brother Ismāīl, assured him of his fraternal love and asked him to retain Balkh and cede Ghaznīn to him in recognition of his superior rights. He also pointed out in that letter that he would not have disputed the will of his father if Ismāīl had possessed the requisite qualifications for kingship. The demand was not met and the rival claimants referred the matter to the arbitrament of the sword. At this juncture Abul Hāris Farīghūnī, father-in-law of Mahmūd, tried to patch up the differences between the two brothers, but he was considered as an interested mediator and thus his efforts to bring about a compromise ended in smoke. After that the two brothers mobilized their forces and advanced on Ghaznīn from their respective places—Mahmūd from Nishāpur and Ismāīl from Balkh. Before they met on the battle-field, Mahmūd won over his brother, Abul Muzaffar Nasr, the governor of Bust, and his uncle Bughrājuq, the governor of Herāt, and made a final attempt at compromise, but that too suffered the same fate His father-in-law had already thrown the weight of his power and influence on his side and now there was nothing to check him from asserting his claims by force of arms The two armies, almost equal in numerical strength, met on the plain of Ghaznī and a well-balanced battle was fought in March, 998 A C. Ismā'il, who was more of a scholar than a soldier, held out heroically for the whole day, but eventually bowed before the calm and cool courage and superior generalship of his brother Towards the close of the day Ismā'il's forces took to flight and he himself sought shelter in a fort, but feeling sure that he could not sustain a long siege, he threw himself at the mercy of his brother, who had promised to treat him with kindness After winning a decisive victory, Mahmūd placed Ismā'il 'in nominal confinement' and provided him with every comfort and convenience. About the end of 999 A C Ismail abused the indulgence shown to him by his brother and hatched up a plot against him Before the nefarious plan was put into practice, Mahmūd got an inkling of the plot*

* How Mahmūd came to know about the plot is thus stated by 'Utbi —

One day the Sultān went out hunting in company with Ismā'il and Nushtigin On the way he saw the latter putting his hand on the hilt of his sword and looking towards the former for some pre arranged signal Mahmūd

and applied for reinforcements. The Amīr hastened to the scene for helping him and halted at Sarakhs. Mahmūd, who had occupied Nishāpur in the meantime, left it without fighting a battle and retreated to Marv-Rūd.* Nishāpur was re-occupied by Begtūzūn, who next marched to Sarakhs to join the Amīr. Suspecting the Amīr of secretly favouring Mahmūd, Fā'iq and Begtūzūn formed a plot against him, took him prisoner on the pretext of a meeting in connection with an alleged problem of importance and then enthroned Abul Fawāris Abdul Malik, a younger brother of Amīr Abul Hāris. Mahmūd now took up the cause of the ex-Amīr and proceeded to Sarakhs to punish Fā'iq and Begtūzūn. At his approach, both the traitors fled to Marv. Mahmūd pursued them thither and actually encamped in front of that place. Before, however, the fight began the parties came to an understanding, whereby Begtūzūn was allowed to retain the command of the troops of Khurāsān as before and Mahmūd was confirmed in his possession of Herāt, Balkh, etc. Thus ended the campaign without achieving the object for which it was launched †. The peace concluded was short-lived. It was broken as soon as the followers of the Amīr, instigated by Dārā bin Qābūs who was opposed to the terms

* Utbī accounts for this unconditional retreat of Mahmūd by saying that he disdained to deal the final blow to the Sāmānids. (T Y, 124)

† See Z A, 60, and T M, 805. It is stated that

general, Fā'iq, brought his schemes to an abrupt close. At the end of October, 999 A C Ilak Khān conquered Bukhārā, captured the Amīr together with his kith and kin and put an end to the Sāmānid Dynasty. Abū Ibrāhīm Ismā'il al-Muntasir, son of Amīr Nūh, who had managed to escape from the custody of Ilak Khān, made abortive efforts to retrieve the fallen fortunes of his family. In Khwārizm he enlisted the support of those who still clung to the cause of the Sāmānids. With their help he attacked Bukhārā, but failed to take it. Thereafter he attacked Nishāpur and inflicted a defeat on Nasr on February 25, 1001 A C. When, however, Mahmūd arrived with reinforcements, he fled to Jurjān. In September next he appeared again in Khurāsān. At his approach Nasr evacuated Nishāpur and applied for reinforcements. Mahmūd sent Abū Sa'id Altūntāsh to his help and the combined forces made an attack on Muntasir, who suffered a crushing defeat and took to flight. Ere long he came back from Jurjān, whither he had fled, and took Sarakhs. He was defeated by Nasr and many of his officers, including Abul Qāsim, were taken prisoners and sent to Ghaznīn. Muntasir tried his luck in Transoxiana and other places, but failure followed him everywhere. He now made an appeal for help to Mahmūd who issued instructions to the governor of Herāt to join forces with him in his venture against Ilak Khān. Without waiting for reinforcements, he marched against Bukhārā and after suffering heavy losses returned to Khurāsān. To put a stop to the disturbances he was creating in his new dominions, Mahmūd sent a large army against him. He fled to Jurjān and made yet another unsuccessful attempt to recover Bukhārā. His stormy career was cut short by an Arab in the Ghuzz desert.

After the conquest of Bukhārā by Ilak Khān* and that of Khurāsān by Sultān Mahmūd, the two great conquerors of their day exchanged friendly greetings and accepted the river Oxus as the boundary-line between their kingdoms. To strengthen this friendship, Mahmūd married the daughter of Ilak Khān. But the Khān coveted the province of Khurāsān so much that even this matrimonial alliance did not exercise any check on his ambitions. No sooner had Mahmūd marched against Multān, than he detailed two divisions of his army against Khurāsān—one under the command of his brother, Chaghartīgīn, and the other under that of his relative, Subashītīgīn. The two generals conquered Balkh and Herāt and with their conquest the whole of Khurāsān passed into the hands of Ilak Khān. Mahmūd had anticipated this invasion and had therefore issued necessary instructions to his officers before his departure from Ghaznīn. As soon as he

* Muslim historians call these Khāns of Turkistān 'Afrāsīvābī Turks' and modern historians call them 'Qarā-Khānids' (M G, 47, p 3)

the people of Transoxiana against the tyranny of 'Alītigīn provided a most plausible pretext and Mahmūd marched against Samarqand where 'Alītigīn had taken his stand. At his approach 'Alītigīn took to flight, but his wife and children were taken prisoners and treated with respect consistent with their position. Qadir Khān of Kāshghar and Mahmūd exchanged greetings and cemented their friendship by matrimonial alliances. While Mahmūd married his daughter, Zainab, to Qadir Khān's son, Bughrā Khān,* Qadir Khan gave one of his daughters in marriage to Muhammad, son of Mahmūd † Hardly had Mahmūd left Samarqand for Ghaznī when 'Alītigīn emerged from his retreat, defeated Qadir Khān and took possession of Samarqand. Qadir Khān sought but failed to secure the support of Mahmūd, because the latter was about to proceed against Somnāth. On his return, however, Mahmūd sent a large force to Qadir Khān who defeated 'Alītigīn and compelled him to come to terms. Thereafter Qadir Khan continued to be friendly towards Mahmūd.

The Ma'mūnids, s.e., the rulers of Jurjāniyyah, were at first the feudatories of the Ma'mūnids of the Samānids but became independent later on. One of them, Abul Hasan 'Ali, married Mahmūd's sister called Kah-Kaljī His brother Abul Abbās, who succeeded him, married his widow and professed to possess profound respect for Mahmūd When, however, the Sultān asked him to acknowledge him as his overlord he referred the matter to a council of officers who refused to submit to foreign yoke When the soldiers learnt of this, they mutinied, but were silenced by a lavish distribution of gold This was, however, a lull before the storm that was yet to come Finding himself between the devil and the deep sea 'Abbās contracted a secret alliance with the Khāns of Turkistān When Mahmūd heard of this secret alliance, he set out with a huge army against Balkh But for the timely intervention of the Khāns of Turkistān Mahmūd would have dealt a decisive blow to his brother-in-law 'Abbās had now no alternative but to submit He acknowledged Mahmūd as his suzerain and inserted his name in the Khutba The soldiers, who had been silenced only with gold, regarded this submission as a standing insult to the honour of their country They advanced on the capital and perpetrated a number of atrocities which culminated in the assassination of Abul Abbās On hearing of the tragic fate of his vassal and brother-in-law, Mahmūd marched against Khwārizm at the head of his army Before taking action he arranged the safe return of his sister and secured the neutrality of the Khāns of Turkistān The regicides inflicted heavy losses on the Ghaznawid forces, but ultimately victory sided with the Sultān. The rebels were completely crushed and the murderers of 'Abul Abbās were put to the sword. The government of Khwārizm and Jurjāniyāh was entrusted to Amīr Hājib Altūntāsh, who had distinguished himself in the fight, and the title of Khwārizmshāh was conferred upon him in recognition of his services. After introducing necessary administrative changes and making appointments and transfers, Mahmūd marched back to Ghaznīn.

* His original name was Yaghāntigīn (T M, 230)

† For marriage ceremonies etc., see Z A, 83-84, and T M, 230-31

Abū Nasr Muhammad bin Asad-ash-Shār
 Conquest of was wise enough to bow before Gharshistān the rising star of Sultān Mahmūd
 He acknowledged the Sultān as his suzerain and read the Khutba in his name.
 But his son, Shāh Muhammad, the younger Shār, offended Mahmūd by refusing to accompany him on an expedition and behaving improperly when called upon to explain his conduct. As a result, Gharshistān* was attacked.
 The elder Shār submitted, but the younger took position in an almost inaccessible hill-fort and from there offered resistance. The fort was besieged and a breach was made in one of its outer walls. The garrison held out heroically, but eventually they sought safety in surrendering themselves. Shāh Muhammad was made captive along with a number

* Gharshistān is also called Gharjistān and Gharj ash Shar in some accounts.

of his officers and sent to Māstang,* where he died some time later. Ghurshistān was annexed to the Ghurāwīd Empire and placed in charge of Abū Ḥasan-al-Mansūr, governor of Māry-Rūd, in 1012 A.C. The elder Shāh was taken to Ghurān and treated with marked respect.

The origin of the Saljūqs is shrouded in the thick mist of antiquity. There are several conflicting accounts about them. Of them, the most probable seems to be this. An important section of the Ghuzz tribe shot off from the parent-stock under their leader, named Saljūq, after whose name it came to be known later on, and migrated to Transoxiana and settled down there. At times they rendered help to the Sāmānidīs in their wars with their neighbours of Turkistān. By lending a helping hand to 'Alītugīn in his conquest of Bukhārā, Isrā'il son of Saljūq acquired immense influence at Bukhārā. When Mahmūd marched against Transoxiana, 'Alītugīn managed to make good his escape but Isrā'il fell into his hands, was taken prisoner and sent to the fort of Kalanjar.† According to an account, the Saljūqs were either induced or forced to migrate to the south of the Oxus and settle down in Khurāsān.

* Māstang is situated in modern Baluchistān.

† This Kalanjar was different from the fort of Kalanjar, situated in Bundhelkhind. It was situated to the north of Jhelum in the pass leading into Kashmir (Vide M.G., 64 foot note).

It seems more probable, however, that they remained in Transoxiana, owing allegiance to the Sultan and waging wars on their own account till the close of his reign when they began to make encroachments upon his immediate possessions. Lest they should become a menace to his power, Mahmūd led a number of expeditions against them personally and defeated them in many battles. They were held in check at that time and they could not enter Khurāsān in force until the accession of Sultan Mas'ūd to the throne.*

Conquest
of Sistān

When Bughrājuq, the governor of Fūshanj, had gone to help Mahmūd in his struggle for the throne, his province was occupied by Tāhir son of Wali-ud-Daulah Abū Ahmad Khalaf bin Ahmad,

the governor of Sistān, who had become independent after the fall of the Sāmanids. After his accession Mahmūd helped Bughrājuq and enabled him to recover his province, but he pursued the enemy in a state of drunkenness and got killed. In December, 999 A.C. Mahmūd marched against Khalaf and forced him to purchase peace on payment of 100,000 dīnārs as indemnity. After that the Sultan returned to his capital. Subsequently a quarrel took place between Khalaf and his son, Tāhir, and the father managed to imprison his son and put him to death. Infuriated by this, ace of Khalaf, the people invited Mahmud to rescue them from his tyranny. In response, the Sultan set out at the head of his army and laid siege to the fort of Sistan. Khalaf offered a stubborn resistance, but sought safety in submission. Mahmud excused him his pardon, allowed him to retain his riches and sent him to Juzjan at his own choice. After appointing Hajib Qaziji as governor of Sistan, the Sultan went back to Ghaznī. Not long after his departure a rebellion broke out in that province and Mahmud had to take the field in person. He put down the rebellion and massacred a large number of the rebels. Placing the province in charge of his own brother Nasr, Mahmud returned to Ghaznī.

* See K.T., ix, 266 ff. and 321 ff., T.N., 116 ff., T.G., 434-35, Z.A., 84 ff., and Ency. of Islam, II, 168 ff.

According to the Tarikh-i-Guzidah when ^{Assumption of the title of 'Sultān'} Khalaf bin Ahmad of Sistan was deserted by Mahmud, he addressed the victor as 'Sultan'—an appellation which signifies authority or power—and the latter liked it and adopted it as his title, giving up that of Amir.^{*} Baizawi, on the other hand, would have us believe that the Khalifa of Baghdad (Al-Qadir Billah) confirmed Mahmud in the government of Khurasan and Sistan, sent him a robe of honour and also conferred upon him the title of 'Sultan' in honour of his victory over Abdul Malik.[†] This seems to be improbable for the simple reason that Mahmud never

* T G., 396, and Cards of Ghazni Kings, 5

TS A M A, 9, foot note

used this title in his coins and remained content with the title of Amīr, with which the Khalīfa distinguished him * There is a strong tradition that Mahmūd was the first king who styled himself as Sultān †

Conquest of Ghūr Muhammad bin Sūrī,‡ the ruler of Mandīsh (eastern Ghūr), acknowledged the suzerainty of Subuktigīn, but renounced allegiance after his death and adopted a hostile attitude In 1011 A.C. Mahmūd marched against him The Ghūrids pooled their resources, offered him a united front and inflicted a defeat on Altuntash who led the advance-guard. Mahmūd joined him immediately afterwards and their combined forces defeated the Ghūrids in some engagements After these reverses, Ibn Sūrī retired to the inaccessible hills from where he could not be dislodged Mahmūd resorted to a ruse He turned back and feigned flight The simple unassuming Ghūrids now rushed out in pursuit of the Ghaznawids, and when they reached a plain Mahmūd turned round and made a desperate charge on the disorderly hordes and scattered them pell-mell Ibn Sūrī, his son and officers were taken prisoners and sent to Ghaznīn Abū 'Alī son of Ibn Sūrī, who had quarrelled with his soner and taken refuge at Ghaznīn, was made governor of Manjish. In 1015 A.C. Mahmud attacked Khwāñin,* captured some fort and returned to Ghaznīn. Some time later the north-western part of Ghūr, called Tāb, was conquered by Mahmud and almost the whole of Ghūr excepting perhaps the inaccessible interior, was annexed to the Ghaznawid Empire.

* C H I , III, 14, foot-note

† S N , 44, K T , II, 92, T N , 75; and W Barthold's Turkestan, 271

‡ 'Utbī calls him simply Ibn Sūrī Also see M G , 70, foot-note 4

Reduction of Qasat was converted into a dependency of Ghaznīn by Subuktagh. In 1010-11 A.C. its ruler renounced allegiance and withheld tribute at the instigation of Iltak Khan. In December, 1011 A.C. Mahmud mobilized his forces against it and laid siege to its fort. Its ruler offered submission and promised to pay 15,000,000 airhams,[†] as indemnity to deliver fifteen elephants and to remit the annual tribute regularly. In return for all this he was allowed to retain his kingdom as a dependency of Ghaznīn.

Conquest of the valleys of rivers Nār and Qīrat In 1020 A.C. Mahmud undertook an expedition against 'the pleasant valleys' of the rivers Nār and Qīrat. While the ruler of the Qīrat valley offered submission and accepted Islam

* This was the south western district of Ghūr (Vide V G 72, foot note 4)

† Ibid. 70 ff

‡ T 1 250 51. Thrit the amount is rather exagerated admits of no doubt

§ These rivers are in modern Kafiristān

with most of his men, that of the Nûr valley adopted a hostile attitude, but had to bow before the might and means of Mahmûd. The people of these valleys worshipped the lion and were apparently Buddhists who worshipped the Sâkiya Sinha (lion), the Buddha. Mahmûd appointed a number of teachers to acquaint them with the rudiments of Islâm and returned to Ghaznîn.*

At the end of the year 1019 A C Mahmûd Expedition against the Afghâns, † marched against the Afghâns, † who inhabited the region between Ghaznîn and the Indus. He inflicted a most severe chastisement on the Afghâns who used to make raids into the frontier towns of the Ghaznavid Empire and had become so daring as to waylay the Imperial forces on their way back from Kanauj. It is said that very few, except women and children, escaped the terrible execution ordered by the Sultân.

Subuktigîn had promised Shams-ul-Ma'âlî Relations with the Ziyârids Abul Hasan Qâbûs bin Washm-gîr bin Ziyâr to restore his kingdom (Jurjân and Tabaristân) to him, but died before fulfilling the promise.
Mahmûd wanted to do what was left undone
by his father on account of his death, but accomplished nothing. Qâbûs was, however, able to occupy Jurjân in August, 998 A C and to

* Z 4, 78-79

† They were neither Ghilzais nor Ghûrids as erroneously supposed by some scholars (See M G, 76, f n 1)

establish his sway over Tabaristān and Jibāl. He was not destined to enjoy a long reign. He was deposed by the army and his son, Mīnūchīhr, was raised to the throne. Mahmūd took up the cause of Dārā, another son of Qābūs, who had quarrelled with his father and taken refuge at Ghaznīn. But Mīnūchīhr disarmed his opposition by recognizing him as his suzerain and promising to pay 50,000 dīnārs annually as tribute. A little later Mahmūd married one of his daughters to him. Once, when the fall of Rayy created misgivings in his mind, Mīnūchīhr adopted a defiant attitude, but made ample apologies and paid a fine of 500,000 dīnārs to appease his overlord.*

The rulers of Mekrān were the feudatories of the Buwāihids. After the fall of the Buwāihids, one of them, viz., Ma'dān, acknowledged Subuktigīn as his suzerain. On Subuktigīn's death he renewed allegiance to his successor, Mahmūd. On his own death one of his sons, named 'Isā, defeated the other, called Abul Mu'askar, and forced him to seek shelter in Sīstān. Mahmūd was at that time away in India on his expedition against Somnāth. On his return to Ghaznīn when Abul Mu'askar waited upon him, he treated him with kindness. Lest the Sultān should raise Abul Mu'askar to the throne, 'Isā acknowledged Mahmūd as his overlord. He was

-with the
rulers of Mekrān

* T Y , 278-80 and 283, and T M , 245-46

then called upon to provide maintenance for his brother and was confirmed in the government of Mehrān. Towards the close of Mahmūd's reign when he was harassed by the Saljūqs, 'Isā declared his independence, which was ensured for some time on account of Mahmūd's death.

On the death of Fakhr-ud-Daulah, the Buwāhid ruler of Ray, his widow was allowed to govern his dominions as a regent of his minor son, Majd-ud Daulah. Mahmūd

Conquest of Ray, Hama-dān & Isfahān
was too clever to risk his reputation by leading his forces against a defenceless widow. This magnanimity was not, however, extended to her son when he grew to manhood and assumed the reins of kingship on the death of his mother. His reign was a continuous scene of mis-government. Terrorized by the Dailamite troops, he invoked the aid of Sultan Mahmūd. The Sultan, who was waiting for such an opportunity, immediately sent an army under the command of Hājib 'Ali who took him captive and sent him to Ghaznīn, from where he was sent to India. Then followed a ruthless persecution of the Carmāthians, Bātinīs and Mu'tazilites and a wholesale destruction of their literature*. The chiefs of the neighbouring places came forward and owed allegiance to him. But the ruler of Abhar, Sarjahān, Shahrazūr and Zanjānt, named

* See Z A, 91, K T, ix, 262, and M G, 83.

† For the locality of these places, vide The Lands of the Eastern Caliphate, by G Le Strange, p 221.

Ibrāhīm bin Marzubān of Dailam, generally known as "Sālār", had the audacity enough to incur the displeasure of Mahmūd by refusing to owe allegiance to him. His destruction was therefore decided upon and a large army was sent against him under the command of an old rival of his, called Marzubān bin Ilk̄zī, who had sought shelter with the Sultan, to punish him for his patriotism. Forming an alliance with some of the leading chiefs of the Dailamites, Marzubān marched against his rival and captured Qazwīn without experiencing much opposition. Meanwhile, Mahmūd returned to his capital and, availing himself of his absence, the Sālār emerged from his retreat, inflicted on his rival a sharp defeat and occupied Qazwīn. Prince Mas'ūd, who was placed in charge of the new province and entrusted with the task of reducing the remaining parts of the Buwayhid territory, opened his régime by leading an expedition against him in conjunction with Marzubān. He laid siege to the stronghold where the Sālār had taken shelter, but the garrison held out heroically and frustrated the efforts of the besiegers. Failing to take the fort by storm, Mas'ūd resorted to underhand means and achieved his object. Holding out high hopes to some of the responsible officers of the Sālār and thus winning them over to his side, he acquainted himself with the vulnerable point of the fort and commenced operations in earnest. Finding himself betrayed by his own officers, the gallant Sālār came out, and made a desperate charge on the besiegers. He was, however, defeated and taken prisoner. His son offered submission and promised to pay tribute. Mas'ud next attacked and occupied Hamadān after inflicting a defeat on the deputy of 'Alā-ud-Daulah bin Kākawaih*. The turn of Isfahān came next. 'Alā-ud-Daulah was allowed to retain it at the recommendation of the Khālīfa of Baghdād on the condition that he would pay a sum of 20,000 dīnārs annually as tribute. Meanwhile, Mahmūd breathed his last (30th April, 1030 A.C.) and Mas'ud marched to Nishāpur to make a bid for the throne †.

* His full name was Abu Ja'far Muhammad bin Dushmanziyār and was also known as simply Ibn Kākawaih. The famous philosopher Abū 'Ali Sīnā (Avicenna) flourished at his court under his patronage (K T, ix, 279, and Tārikh-ul-Hukamā, by Al-Qiftī, pp 419-26).

† K T, ix, 262-63 and 279, T M, 11-25 and 359, T N, 87. Bašhaqī also states that Mas'ud was left at Rayy with an ill-equipped army of only 2,000 (T M, 258).

CHAPTER III

SULTAN MAHMUD THE GREAT—II
HIS INVASIONS OF INDIA

Aiptugīn and his successors had led a number of expeditions against the frontier towns of India and Subuktugīn had 'fought numerous battles with Rāja Jaipāl of Wāhind (modern Hūnd) and extended his kingdom as far as Lamghān. It was left for Mahmūd to continue the forward policy of his father and to carry his conquests far into the interior of India. When the Khalīfa of Baghdād recognized him as an independent ruler in 999 A C 'he made it incumbent upon himself to lead an expedition against India every year'*. In pursuance of this resolution he led not less than seventeen expeditions against India and it must be recorded to his credit that in none of them he suffered a defeat.

* This is what 'Uibī says (T Y, 154). The translation of this passage in E & D (Vol II, p 24) is inaccurate, and it has misled many in that it implies that Mahmūd took a vow to undertake a ḥajj war against Hind every year and casts a halo of Jihād on or rather gives a 'touc̄h' of religious fanaticism to what were purely secular exploits (Vide Chapter IV).

† The accounts of Mahmūd's seventeen (not twelve as erroneously stated by some historians) expeditions against India, as given in the contemporary chronicles and later histories, are materially discrepant. Their number and dates differ in different accounts, the

The first of his Indian expeditions was directed against the frontier towns and

(1) Towns of forts of the Khyber Pass in the Khyber Pass month of September, 1000 A C

It resulted in the capture of several places Having entrusted the government of the newly conquered territory to an able officer, Mahmūd returned to Ghaznīn with as much booty as he was able to collect †

Jaipāl, the Rāja of Wāihind, whom Subuktigīn had twice defeated and

(2) Peshāwar reduced to submission, was no longer friendly Muhammad bin

'Alī, the reputed author of the Mazmā-ul-Ansāb, informs us that after the death of Amir Subuktigīn, Rāja Jaipāl tried to win back what

spoils obtained by the Sultān in each of them have been variously estimated—in some so exaggerated as to stagger our imagination—and the names of persons and places are too often corrupted, confused and carelessly recorded by the scribes I have exercised the greatest care in reconciling these conflicting and even contradictory accounts and tried to be accurate as far as possible

* Gardīzī is the only contemporary chronicler who makes a mention of this expedition Ferishtā and Nizām-ud-dīn Ahmad are the two later historians who have reproduced it in their works They seem to have drawn upon Gardīzī's Zain-ul-Akhbār, but both of them have made some mistakes in copying it Sir W Haig (C H I , 111, 13) regards this expedition as 'apocryphal' without assigning any good reasons It was not made much of by the contemporary chroniclers obviously because it was a comparatively minor expedition, confined only to the frontier towns of India

the Amīr had conquered from him and attacked Mahmūd, who set out from Ghaznī at the head of his army to repel the invasion * The army of the Rāja is said to have consisted of 30,000 foot, 12,000 horse and 300 elephants The two armies encamped in the neighbourhood of Peshāwar and in a fierce fight that took place between them on the 27th of November, 1001 A C , the Hindūs were defeated and put to flight Their Rāja, with fifteen of his sons and grandsons, was made captive and sent to 'a slave market' in Khurāsān and sold there for 80 ainārs.† The spoils were 'beyond

* Majma-ul-Ansāb quoted by Dr M Nāzim in M G , 87, foot-note 1

† The original word of which the English equivalent is taken to be 'a market' is Man-Yazid, which has puzzled a number of competent scholars On the authority of the MSS of the Tabqāt-i Nāsiri, Raverty assures us that 'nearly every copy' has the word 'Man-Yazid' While translating the relevant passage, Sir H Elliot (E & D , 11, 270) has erroneously written 'Yazd' for 'Man-Yazid' On the authority of the MSS of the Tabqāt-i Nāsiri, Raverty calls it 'Man-Yazid', and relying on the MS of a qasīda of 'Unsurī', Dr M Nāzim calls it Mirand Both these scholars have taken it to be the name of a place This is perhaps because it is followed by the word Khurāsān in the original text On the authority of the Ghujās-ul-Lughāt and the Mīyād ul-Fuzalā, Professor Hodivala (S I M H , xiii-xiv and 191-93) takes it to mean 'a market, an auction, and an auctioneering room' and, after discussing the point at length, comes to the conclusion that "Jayapāla was publicly exposed at one of the slave auctions in some market in Khurāsān, just like thousands of other Hindū captives" His conclusion is confirmed by Isāmī, the author of the Futūh-us-Salāṭīn, a metrical history of Mediæval India (1000 1349 A C), all bounds of calculation' They included, inter alia, sixteen* precious necklaces of pearls, one of which was of 'enormous value' The Rāja was restored to his kingdom on the conditions that he would pay 250,000 dīnārs as ransom and give fifty elephants Jaipāl was then allowed to go to his capital, but in order to ensure the fulfilment of the conditions of the peace-treaty, the Sultān detained two princes, a son and a grandson of the Rāja, as hostages After spending the winter months at Waihind and reducing the neighbouring places, Mahmūd returned to Ghaznīn in the spring of the same year Humiliated by repeated reverses, the Rāja sank low in the eyes of his subjects 'who refused to written in 1350 A C century and recently lighted upon and published by Dr Mahdī Hussain of Agrā The relevant verses are —

فتاش همان رائج حیمال دست	پنک حملہ اور اح مدد و شکست
دد لال نارار بردہ سپرد	مرو را باقصائی عربیں نہر
دشتاد دیوار حیمال را	شیدم نعمان ہر مانرووا
بهاش تھارن در اندوختند	مقیمان نارار نعروحتند

In view of all this, it is impossible to agree with Dr M Nāzim who says that "the sale of Jaipāl meant only the fixing of his ransom" (M G, 87) The object of Mahmūd seems to have been to intimidate the Rāja so that he might yield to his demands unconditionally

* Dr M Nāzim erroneously gives the number of the necklaces captured as 'fifteen' (M G, 87) One necklace, which was of 'enormous value', was taken from the Rāja himself and fifteen from his relatives Hence sixteen is the correct number (T F, 1, 24).

acknowledge a king who had been a captive in the hands of the Muslims' and being fed up with his lot, he solemnly made over his kingdom to his son, Anandpāl, mounted a funeral pyre and burnt himself to death in the customary manner of his proud race *

Bijī Rāī, the Rāja of Bhātiya,† had been on good terms with Subuktingin
 (3) Bhātiya When, therefore, Mahmūd attacked Jaipāl he expected aid from his father's friend On being disappointed, the Sultān marched against him to punish him 'for his failure to support him' ‡ At his approach the gallant Rāja came out of his fort and offered a pitched battle to the invader The battle raged for three days and the Rāja defended his position very bravely, but on the fourth day a

* T Y , 159, Z A , 56, and T F 1, 24

† See supra, p 11, note Bhera seems to be a more probable identification of Bhātiya, for the capture of Wāihind had just 'opened Mahmūd's way into the Northern Punjab' and 'he had not even crossed the Indus', and it is difficult to believe how he could have penetrated as far as Uchch, Bhatinda, Bhatner or Bhāwalpur, which have been offered as identifications of Bhātiya by different scholars Each of the said four places is at a distance of not less than 300 miles from Wāihind and it would not have been possible for the Sultān to reach there "without possessing a single base of operations ,any means of keeping up his communications or of preventing the rulers whose territories he had invaded from cutting off his retreat" (See S I-M H , 138-39)

‡ C H I , III, 14

desperate charge led by the Sultān decided the day in his favour. The Rāja took to flight and found refuge in a fort, which was surrounded by a broad deep ditch. The Sultān laid siege to the fort and ordered that the ditch be filled with earth, stones and trees. The satisfactory progress of this process depressed the spirits of the Rāja who fled to a forest,* leaving the garrison to defend the fort. But he was not safe even there, for his whereabouts were soon discovered and he was pursued to the place where he was sheltering himself. Surrounded by Muslim soldiers on all sides and feeling sure that he would soon be taken prisoner, "the high-spirited" Rāja turned his sword against his own breast and stabbed himself to death †. Desereted by their Chief, the garrison also got depressed and allowed the invader to occupy the fort without facing much opposition. "No quarter was given to the enemy (Hindūs) and only those who embraced Islām escaped the vengeance of the conquerors"‡. Enormous booty, including 120

K

* T Y, 210 Gardīzī (Z A 67) says that the Rāja fled to the bank of the river Sāsind, "which," according to Dr M Nāzīm "might be the old name of the river Hākra" (M G, 100, n 8) Ferishtā substitutes the word Sind (Indus) for Sāsind (T F, 1, 24).

† T Y, 210, and Z A, 67. It is difficult to reconcile this heroic act of the "high spirited" Rāja with his flight from the fort at the approach of the invader.

‡ M G, 101 Mark the nature of conversion

elephants, fell into the hands of the victors.* After the victory the Sultān stayed there for sometime to subjugate the surrounding places. During his stay he is said to have "appointed teachers to instruct the converts in the rudiments

* Referring to this booty, Dr M Nāzīm says that "the share of the Sultān alone amounted to 120 elephants besides gold, silver and arms" (M G 101). This statement conveys the impression that there were some more elephants as well, forming the share of others. Dr Nāzīm seems to have followed Sir H Elliot who has expressed the same view in a foot-note in E & D, II, 30 which reads "Ferishta says 280 (elephants were captured) and Mirkhond 120, but does not notice that this was the personal share of the Sultān." In view of the well-known fact that in those days all elephants formed the property of the king and no private individual had the right to keep them, it was absurd to point out the personal share of the Sultān. Altogether 120 (or 280 according to Gardīzī and Ferishta) elephants were captured and all of them ipso facto belonged to the Sultān. Not a single one went to anyone else. The words "personal" and "alone" used by Sir H Elliot and Dr Nāzīm respectively are highly misleading. Utbī has used the words حصہ اسٹاپار and in the original Arabic text (Delhi Lith., 260) they are not qualified by any such word the equivalent of which may be "personal" or "alone". All that Gardīzī (Z A, 67) says is that 280 elephants were captured. In the Newal Kishor edition of the Tārikh-i-Ferishta, Vol I, p 24 the number of elephants captured is ١٢٠، ٣٦٠، ٣٧٠ i.e. two times twenty and eighty, which work out to be 120 and not 280, unless سنت is taken to be a mistake for سو. For the royal prerogative about the keeping of elephants, vide E & D, II, 40, III, 77, 91 92, 120, 235, 316, IV, 504, T N (Ravery), 650 note, 662, T M, 349, 488, and T A, 33.

of Islam* When he left for Ghaznī he suffered great losses on the way, in the first place because the Indus was in flood and it exacted a heavy toll, and secondly because Abū Fateh Dāūd, the ruler of Multān, blocked the passage of his army through his territories and augmented its sufferings † Thus after suffering many hardships and sustaining many losses, the Sultān reached Ghaznī about the middle of 1005 A C

Shaikh Hamid Lawī‡ had cultivated friendly relations with Amīr Subuktigīn
 • (4) Multan and thus secured his position in Sind and Multān But his grandson, Abū Fateh Dāūd bin Nasīr, reversed this cautious policy and gave offence to Sultān Mahmūd by embracing the Carmāthian creed, entering

* Ihd, and T Y, 210 Note that conversion precedes preaching and propaganda

† K T, ix, 149

‡ Ferishta (T F, i, 24) has erroneously written 'Lodi' and the error has been repeated by Sir W Haig (C H I iii, 14), Professor M Habib (S M G, 23) and others despite the fact that it was fully exploded by Raverty long ago (Mihran, 325 note) "Lodī" is a miswriting of Lāwī who, according to Mas'ūdī, was one of the ancestors of Dāūd (U Z, 234, 385) Mas'ūdī is supported by many other authorities and they all agree that the rulers of Multan were the descendants of one Usama bin Lāwī bin Ghilib The Lodis were Afghans and according to Raverty, "there were no Lodis nor Lodi rulers in Multan at this time nor centuries afterwards" (See UG, 96, foot-note 5, and S I U H, 141)

into an alliance with the Rāja of Bhātiya and attacking the Ghaznawid army on its return-march after the conquest of Bhātiya*. Thus enraged, Sultān Mahmūd set out from Ghaznīn in the spring of 1006 A C and launched his next expedition against the ruler of Multān. The direct route to Multān being risky because it was not safe to cross the Indus lower down, the Sultān proposed to pass through Anandpāl's territories and cross the river near Peshāwar, but was opposed by the forces of the Rāja. After defeating the Rāja and driving him into the hills of Kashmīr, he resumed his march to Multān. Not willing to court destruction in an open battle, Dāud shut himself up in the fort and defended his position for a week, after which he sued for peace†. Imposing a tribute of 20,000 golden dirhams per year on

* Ferishta simply says that Dāud had annoyed Mahmūd by his unbecoming behaviour (T F, i, 25)

† According to 'Utbī, he (Dāud) determined to load all his property on elephants and carry it off to Sarandib, and he left Multān empty" (E & D, ii, 31). This is a most preposterous statement. It has given rise to many surmises and speculations, some of which are no less amazing. Raverty identified Sarandib with Kachh Bhuj (Mīhrān, 325 note). Professor Hodivala suggests the name of "Debal-Sind" and says that it "would appear to be a more plausible restoration" (S I-M H, 141). Dr M Nizim says that he (Dāud) "fled to an island in the Indus" (M G, 97). In view of the fact that the garrison defended the fort for seven days (Z A, 67), the flight of Dāud is improbable. Had he fled away, the garrison would have submitted without resistance.

Dāūd and exacting promises of future allegiance, good faith and abjuration of heretical beliefs, Mahmūd marched back to Ghaznīn, leaving Sukhpāl, alias Nawāsa Shāh, in charge of the campaign against the outlying parts of Multān * He would have taken a decisive step against Dāūd and completed the subjugation of the entire province of Multān, but had to content himself with the terms stated above because hardly had he won victory when he received the news of the invasion of his home-lands by Ilak Khān, the King of Kāshghar

Taking advantage of Mahmūd's troubles,
 (5) Bhātiya Nawāsa Shāh† apostatized and
 declared himself independent
 Such a conduct on his part was bound to bring

* Dr M Nāzīm, on the authority of Guzīdah (T G, 397) says that Sukhpāl was left in "charge of the government of Multān" (M G, 98) and Sir W Haig says that he was appointed governor of Und (Waikhind) but does not specify his authority (C H I, iii, 15) In view of the fact that a peace was concluded with Dāūd, it is wrong to say that Sukhpāl was entrusted with the government of Multān Haig seems to have followed Ferishta (T F, i, 25) a little carelessly All that Ferishta says is that Sukhpāl was left in charge of the campaign against Bhatinda (Bhātiya)

† He was a grandson of Rāja Jaipāl, who had been left as a hostage with Subuktigīn and who is said to have been taken prisoner and converted to Islām by Abu 'Alī Simjūrī after the defeat of Mahmūd at Nishāpur (Z A, 69) He was called Nawās Shāh because he was the Nawāsa (grandson) of the Shāh (Jaipāl of the Hindushāhiya Dynasty)

on him the usual punishment. The danger from Kāshghar being over, Mahmūd advanced at the head of his army early in the year 1008 A.C. and attacked him. Nawāsa Shāh was defeated, dispossessed of 400,000 dirhams, which he had accumulated, and thrown into prison for the rest of his life.*

Anandpāl, who had allied himself with
 (6) Punjāb Dāūd, the ruler of Multān, and blocked the passage of the Muslim army through his territory, now sent ambassadors on all sides and invoked the assistance of the neighbouring princes of Hindustān for stemming the rising tide of the Muslim conquest. Among those who readily responded to his request were the Rājas of Ujjain, Gwālior, Kālinjar, Kanauj, Delhi and Ajmer, all of whom joined him in his invasion of the Ghaznawid Kingdom. This was the first Hindu confederacy formed against Mahmūd and to overthrow it was no easy task †. Trilochan-pāl, ‡ son of Anandpāl, was entrusted with the

* Z A , 69, T Y , 223 , and T F , 1, 26

† Fenshta alone is responsible for making a mention of this confederacy (T F , 1, 26). In the list of the confederates he includes the Rājas of Delhi and Ajmer as well, but it is contended that Delhi and Ajmer were not founded at that time. (See M G., 89, foot-note 3, and Iraqian Antiquary, xxvi, 162)

‡ Dr M. Nazīm, following 'Utbī (E & D n 33) calls him Brahmanpāl, which is an error (See S . H , 133)

command of the combined forces of the Rājas and directed to advance towards Peshāwar. These forces were further swelled on the way by the enlistment of 'the wild and warlike' Gakhars. So great was the national excitement among the Hindūs on this occasion that they spared nothing to destroy the neighbouring Muslim kingdom root and branch. Those who were poor gave ample proof of their patriotism by contributing as much as they could from their meagre earnings. Even their women are said to have sold their jewellery and gold ornaments in order to augment the resources of war. On receiving the news of this Hindū invasion, Mahmūd marched out on the 31st of December, 1008 A C., crossed the Indus and reached the plain opposite Waīhind. This time Mahmūd observed that unlike before the Hindūs had sunk their differences and pooled their resources for national defence. He was highly impressed by the devotion of the Hindūs and their women. When the battle began, the bare-headed and bare-footed Gakhars, armed with spears and swords, appeared on the scene, rushed into the thick of the fight and killed a large number of Muslims. The prudence and personal prowess of the Sultān, coupled with a piece of good luck, turned the tables against the Hindūs. When the fury of the Hindū attack abated and the Hindūs were exhausted, the Argus-eyed Mahmūd sent his personal guards to sweep round and make a sudden attack on the rear of the Hindū army. This was done and, while effecting a partial change of front to repulse the attack, the Hindu ranks ran riot and in a state of confusion they took to flight. Mahmud won the day and a large amount of booty, including thirty elephants, fell into his hands. The dispersal of the Hindu hordes opened the way for further penetration by revealing the weakness of the Indian military system.

Mahmud next marched to the fort of Nagarkot, situated near Kangri on the summit of a hill and surrounded by the river Baganga. The fort was a place of great sanctity, because it had a temple, which stood high in the estimation of the people and enjoyed a wide reputation as the repository of most of the wealth of the neighbouring Rajas. Mahmud laid siege to it and the garrison surrendered it after three days 'heroic defence'. The spoils obtained were 'beyond the limit of calculation'. Among other precious things, they included a vast amount of gold and silver ingot, costly apparel, a profusely decorated throne and a house of silver*. Even after making considerable allowance for exaggeration, the fact cannot escape recognition that the spoils were colossal, so much so that envoys from different countries flocked to

* 'Utbi has given a graphic description of this 'house of silver'. From it we can safely infer that it was a folding pavilion made of silver, chiefly meant for use in royal journeys and progresses. It was not a silver throne as 'Unsuri would have us believe (See S.I.M.H., 143).

Ghaznīn when that wealth was being displayed there Placing the fort in charge of his own officers, the Sultān returned to Ghaznīn in the middle of the year 1009 A C After his departure Anandpāl managed to re-establish his sway in the Salt Range, with Nandāna as his capital

In 1009 A C. Mahmūd invaded India again

(7) Narāvan This time he attacked Narāyan or
Narāyanpur* and inflicted a stunning defeat on its Rāja After capturing and plundering the town, he returned to his capital Some time later the agents of the Rāja waited upon him with proposals of a permanent peace and 'their good wishes for his future prosperity' According to the terms of the peace-treaty that was then concluded, the Rāja offered to pay a yearly tribute and fifty elephants and to send 2,000 soldiers to serve in the Ghaznawid army Mahmūd was pleased to accept these terms The peace is believed to have given a great encouragement to trade between India and Khurasān Politically, this expedition opened the way to the heart of Hindūstān and the Sultān could now march through Narāyanpur and attack the Rājas beyond

* Cunningham identified it with Narāyanpur in Alwar State (See his Ancient Geography, pp 338-44, and ASI, Vol ii, pp 242-47 and Vol vi, pp 91-93) Of all the contemporary chroniclers, 'Utbi alone has mentioned this expedition in his book He does not give the date but places it between the expeditions to Bhīmnagar (Nagarkot) and Ghūr

Taking advantage of the invasion of Khurāsān by Ilak Khān and of Mahmūd's absence, Abul Fateh Dāūd, the ruler of Multān, renounced allegiance to the Sultān and declared his independence. Mahmūd's next expedition was, therefore, directed against him. It was undertaken in October, 1010 A.C. This time Dāūd was taken prisoner and sent to Ghaznīn and confined in the fort of Ghūrak.* Multān was completely subjugated and annexed to Ghaznīn. After appointing a governor there, Mahmūd marched back to Ghaznīn.

In 1012 A.C. Mahmūd proposed to march from Ghaznīn with the object of (9) Thānesar capturing Thānesar, which was then one of the most famous shrines of India, renowned for the age-long riches accumulated in its vaults. On learning of his intention, Anandpāl sent his men to Ghaznīn to request Mahmūd to take fifty elephants from him every year and impose an annual tribute on the people of that place.

* 'Ghūrak or Ghorak (جورک) is situated about fifty miles north-west of Qandhār' (M.G., 99, n. 3). In the Tārikh-i-Ferishta (i, 27) it is written as جرک. It appears that ج has been left out by the scribe, for Ghūr was conquered a year later (1011 A.C.)

† Dr. Nāzim calls him Trilochanpāl, which is wrong, because 'the Thānesar campaign was undertaken during the life of Anandpāl (S.M.G., 32, n. 14 and T.F., i, 27). Sir W. Haig erroneously calls him Jaipāl II (C.H.I., iii, 17-18).

and spare it because it had an idol called Chakraswāmin,^{*} to which the Hindūs were so devoutly attached. The Sultān declined the offer and ordered the Rāja to allow full and free passage to his forces through his territory. The Rāja could not but obey, but at the same time he warned the Rāja of Thānesar about the impending danger. On receipt of this timely information the Rāja of Thānesar sought and secured the support of the neighbouring princes. But before the clumsy machinery of the Indian confederacy could move, Mahmūd marched through the Punjāb, defeated on the way a Rāja called Rām, who opposed his advance near the Sutlej, and reached Thānesar. At his approach, the Rāja took to flight, leaving the Chakraswāmin to take care of itself. The invader entered the town without encountering opposition, because it was found in an undefended position. A vast booty, together with a large number of captives and the idol Chakraswāmin, was transported to Ghaznī. †

^{*} T F, i, 27. Chakraswāmin means "The Lord of the Wheel". It was a bronze image of Vishṇu, which held the weapon, called Chakra, in one of its hands. (See Sachao, i, 117, and Z A, 70)

† Utbī places the invasion of Thānesar after that of Nandana. He does not give the date and therefore seems to have made a mistake. Elliot follows him in the error to mislead many others, including Dr M Nāzīm (M G, 91 and 103) and Sir W Haig (C H I, iii, 17). The expedition against Thānesar was undertaken during the lifetime of Anandpal and therefore the one against Nandana, which

Trilochanpāl,* the Rāja of Nandana,† "was personally well inclined towards (10) Nandana. the Mussalmāns, but he seems to have been a weak man and the direction of affairs came into the hands of his son, known to contemporaries as the 'Nīdar' (Fearless) Bhīm, who stoutly reversed the policy of his grandfather and put an end to the Ghaznavid alliance"‡ In order to keep his way clear to India, Mahmūd marched against Nandana in the autumn of 1013 A C but abandoned the expedition owing to a heavy snow-fall In the following spring (1014 A C) the Ghaznawids set out again, "ascending the hills like mountain-goats and descending them like torrents of water" On hearing of Mahmūd's advance, Trilochanpāl entrusted the defence of the fort to his son, Bhīmpāl, and himself retired to the Kashmīr Pass, presumably with the object of enlisting the support of Sangramārāja, the ruler of Kashmīr On his arrival, Mahmūd laid siege to the fort and, after some days' futile fighting, succeeded in drawing out a detachment of Bhīmpāl into the plain and putting it to the

was directed against his son, could not have preceded it Gardīzī (Z A, 70) places it in 1011–12 A C, which seems to be correct Ferishta adheres to the correct order (T F, i, 27-28) I have followed Gardīzī and Ferishta.

* Sir W Haig (C H I, iii, 17) calls him Jaipāl II which is wrong

† It is called Nardīn by 'Utbī and Nandūnah by Baīhaqī and Gardīzī It is situated in the Salt-Ranges

‡ See S M G, 34

sword On receipt of fresh reinforcements, Bhīmpāl appeared in the plain and attacked the invaders, but was beaten back The Hindūs took to flight to find refuge in the fort of Nandana The fort was besieged and the garrison sought safety in submission After placing a garrison in Nandana, Mahmūd pushed on in pursuit of Trīlochanpāl, defeated him in a valley to the north of Jhelum and received the submission of "numerous Rājas of the neighbourhood" Leaving Sārūgh as governor of Nandana and possessing himself of immense booty, Mahmūd returned to Ghaznī

In 1015 A C the Sultān started from Ghaznī at the head of his army and proposed to penetrate into Kashmīr, probably with the object of punishing Sangramā-rāja for helping Trīlochanpāl He, however, failed to storm the fort of Lohkot * After reducing the neighbouring regions, he abandoned the enterprise and returned On his way back his soldiers lost their way, with the result that many of them perished in the extensive morasses that blocked their passage This expedition against Kashmīr was followed by another in 1021 A. C , but that too suffered the fate of its predecessor and the Sultān finally gave up the idea of conquering Kashmīr †

* Kalhāna and Gardīzī call it Lohkot and Lohārkotta respectively Both these names mean 'The Iron Fort' It is identified with modern Loharīn (M G , 104, f n 6)

† Z A , 79

The twelfth expedition was undertaken with a view to penetrate right into the
 (12) Baran interior of the Indian Continent

In 1018 A C the Sultān set out at the head of a huge army, recruited chiefly from Central Asia Passing through the Punjāb, crossing the Jumna and capturing all the forts and fortified places, including Sirsāwa,* that blocked his passage, he reached Baran (modern Bulandshehr), whose governor, Hara Datta, tendered submission and embraced Islām along with his 10,000 men From there Mahmūd marched to Mahāban,† situated in the Muttra District (U P), whose chief, Kul Chand,‡ also submitted without offering any

* For the origin and antiquity of Sirsāwa, see A S I, vii, 79

† Gardīzī calls it Mahāwan and 'Unsurī calls it Mahāwin It is situated six miles east of Muttra on the left bank of the Jumna. (See S I-M H, 146)

‡ Kul Chand is said to have been only a 'governor' of the fort (C H I, iii, 19) This is incorrect 'Utbi's reference to him that he was "a Satanic leader, who had assumed superiority over all other rulers, defeated, put to flight everyone he had fought with and possessed a great army, numerous elephants and strong forts which were secure from attack and capture" militates against the theory that he was but a 'governor' and conclusively shows that he was one of the greatest and strongest rulers of his day—a conclusion which is also confirmed by the fact that in the battle he fought with Mahmūd as many as 50,000 of his soldiers were slain and not less than 150 of his elephants were captured after his defeat Ferishta (T F, i, 29) calls him a Rāja. Professor Hodivala suggests that Kul Chand was none other than Kalla Chīd (See S I-M H, 146 47)

pure gold,* he proceeded towards Kanauj, a great citadel of Hindūstān, and appeared before its walls early in 1019 A C. The descriptions of the grandeur of the city and of the splendour of its Court, as given by Hindū and Muslim chroniclers, stagger our belief. It contained seven forts and ten thousand temples. Its army consisted of eighty-thousand men in armour, thirty-thousand horsemen and five hundred thousand infantry. Notwithstanding this overwhelming strength at his disposal, Rājyapāl's† heart melted, after a short and feeble resistance and he sought safety in flight. Mahmūd entered the seven forts, and seized the wealth treasured there.

After the capture of Kanauj Mahmūd marched to Munj,‡ a strongly garrisoned fort, well-

* Sir W Haig's estimate of the gold yielded by these idols is 548 lbs (C H I, iii, 19) This again is without authority. Utbī informs us that it was 98,300 misqāls, i.e., 1010 lbs Avoirdupois (See S I-M H, 149)

† He is called Jai Chand by Sir W Haig (C H I, iii, 19) Professor Hodivala dismisses it as 'wrong' and calls him Rājyapāl. He supports his contention by citing evidence from inscriptions etc (S I-M H, 149) Utbī calls him Rājpāl

‡ Elliot identified this place with Majhāwan, some ten miles south of Kānpur or Cawnpore (E & D, ii, 458) Dr Vost was of opinion that it corresponded to Manaich, which is said to have been the old name of the modern town of Zafarābād, situated near Jaunpur (J R A S, 1905) His hypothesis is followed by Sir W Haig in The Cambridge History of India (Vol iii, p 20) Dr M Názim differs from them and, while stating that Mahmūd

left it to the mercy of the invader and gone into a forest with his army and treasure Mahmūd pursued him thither, defeated him and dispossessed him of his wealth This was the crowning exploit of a most laborious campaign, after which Mahmūd returned to Ghaznī with enormous wealth and a large number of captives

The cowardly conduct of Rājyapāl, the
 (13) Kanauj Rāja of Kanauj, earned him the
 and Kālinjar enmity of the neighbouring Rājas who formed a league against him with Ganda,* the Chandela Rāja of Kālinjar, as their head. The allied forces were put under the command of the Chandela crown-prince, Vīdhyaḍhāra, and sent against Rājyapāl of Kanauj to punish him for his pusillanimity.
 Rājyapāl was killed in battle and probably his son, Trilochanpāl,† was placed on the vacant throne.Flushed with this victory, Ganda entered into an alliance with Trilochanpāl, son of Anandpāl, and promised to help him in winning back his ancestral kingdom from Sultān Mahmūd.‡ On receipt of information about these events, Mahmūd made up his mind to march against the Chandela prince and his

* Some historians call him Nanda, but Ganda is the correct name

† He is said to have been a son of Rājyapāl (O H I, 383)

‡ Z A, 76, and K T, IV, 218

accomplishes and to teach them a lesson. In the autumn of 1019 A.C. he left Ghaznī with a firm determination to retaliate the assassination of his vassal, Rājyapāl, and to deal a death-blow to the league that had been formed against him and was now contemplating to overthrow the Ghaznavid power in the Punjab. On hearing of his approach, Trilochanpāl of Lahore proceeded south to join forces with his namesake of Kanauj. Mahmūd pursued him post-haste and overtook him near the river Ruhut.* The Rāja managed to cross the river and sent a detachment to prevent the enemy from crossing it. Encouraged by their leader's promise of "a life of repose after that day of trouble", the Muslims plunged into the river and landed on the other side of it 'without the loss of a single life'. Marshalling his forces in battle array Mahmūd inflicted a sharp defeat on his opponents and obtained enormous booty, including many elephants. The Rāja, though wounded in the battle, managed to escape and sought shelter with the Chindela Rāja of Kalinjar. The turn of Ganda therefore came next. He was awaiting the invader with a huge army, consisting of 36,000 horse, 145,000 foot and 640 elephants. Ascending an eminence with a view to reconnoitre the position of the Hindu army, Mahmūd saw 'an imposing panorama of camps, pavilions and embankments and he regretted

* The river Kamiganga is known as Ruhut (Rāhib) in its lower course. (I.G.I., xx, 175)

having ventured so far' In this hour of distress and disappointment he prostrated himself on the ground and sought divine aid, which never failed him In the evening the Muslims fought a successful engagement with a detachment of the Rāja and in the morning they were told that the Hindūs had deserted the camp Stricken with panic, the Rāja seems to have taken to flight in the guise of night All the valuables, which the Hindūs had left behind, were taken possession of and the Rāja was pursued to some distance, but he managed to make good his escape, though many of his men were captured or killed Thereafter, Mahmūd marched back to Ghaznīn On the way 580 elephants, belonging to Ganda, happened to fall into his hands*

The opposition of Trilochanpāl, the Rāja of (14) Punjab Lāhore, to the forces of Sultān Mahmūd in the expedition against Kalinjar furnished a good ground for invading his kingdom In 1021 A C Mahmūd appeared in India again and inflicted a crushing defeat on Bhīmpāl who had succeeded his father, Trilochan-pāl, in the meantime The Rāja took shelter with the ruler of Ajmer and died there in 1026 A C †

* Z A, 77

† T F, i, 31 Dr M Nāzim (II G, 96, n 1) does not seem to be justified in criticising Sir W Haig's statement that "he (Bhīmpāl) fled and sought an asylum with the Chauhan rāja of Ajmer" (C H I, iii, 22) He is, however, right in saying that Bhīmpāl succeeded to the diminished dominions of his father and died in 1026

With him the Hindūshāhiya Dynasty came to an end. The results of this expedition were more enduring than those of others. The Punjab was cleared and annexed to the Ghaznavid Empire. A regular Amīr was entrusted with the government of the province with his head-quarters at Lāhore, and garrisons were stationed at important places.

Next year Mahmūd marched against Ganda
 (15) Gwālior who was still strong enough to defy and Kālinjar the authority of the Sultān. He first laid siege to and stormed the 'impregnable' fort of Gwālior, and after receiving the submission of its chief, called Arjan, who was a feudatory of Ganda, he proceeded towards Kālinjar, the stronghold of the Chandela Rāja, and surrounded it on all sides, so that all approaches to the fort were closed. Finding himself in a perilous situation, Ganda purchased safety by offering submission without resistance. Having obtained enormous amount of wealth, Mahmūd concluded a peace-treaty with the Rāja and went back to Ghaznī, laden with riches. Both Ferishta and Nizām-ud-Dīn Ahmad say that, in order to please the Sultān, the Rāja composed a flattering verse in Hindī and sent it to his over-lord who, in return, rewarded him with a robe of honour and conferred upon him the government of as many as fifteen fortresses *

A C (M G, 95-96) In his presence, however insignificant his power might have been, a Muslim governor of the Punjab would not have been appointed.

The crowning achievement of Sultān Mahmūd
 (16) Somnāth was indeed the sack of Somnāth
 in Kāthiāwār (1025-26 A C) †
 The shrine of Somnāth‡ was the most celebrated,
 the most opulent and the most revered on the Continent of India "The wealth and importance of the shrine," says Sir W Haig "far exceeded those of any temple which he had yet attacked One thousand Brahmans daily attended the temple, three hundred and fifty of the unfortunate women whom the Hindūs dedicate
 nominally to the service of their gods and
 actually to the appetites of their priests danced continually before the idol, which was a huge
lingam or phallus These priests and attendants

* Both these authorities seem to have drawn upon
 Gardīzī (Z A , 80)

† Ibn-ul-Asīr (K T , 18, 241-42), Ibn Zafir (M G , 115),
 Sibt-ul-Jawzī (M G , 115), Alberūnī (Sachao, II, 9 & 103), Gardīzī (Z A , 86-87), Nizām-ud-Dīn Ahmad (T A , 9) and Khwāndmīr (E & D IV, 180) place this expedition in the year 1025-26 A C While translating the relevant passage of K T in E & D , (Vol II, p 469), Elliot has carelessly recorded 414 A H for 416 A H This is an 'inadvertent error,' which has misled all those who have drawn upon E & D Ferishta has recorded 415 A H as the year of this expedition (T F , II, 32), but his evidence cannot overweigh that of the original authorities quoted above Mark the
 mistake repeated by Sir W Haig (C H I , III, 23), M Elphinstone (H I , 334), and Sm ' ' H I , 193), who have blindly followed Ferishta and

‡ For its site etc , see M G , 2

were supported from the endowments of the temple, which are said to have consisted of the revenues of 10,000 villages, the idol was washed daily with water brought from the Ganges, 750 miles distant, and the jewels of the temple were famed throughout the length and breadth of India ".* The object of Mahmūd in undertaking this arduous expedition is thus expressed by Allāma Kāmil Ibn-ul-Asīr —

"When Yamin-ud-Daulah (Mahmūd) was gaining victories and demolishing temples in India, the Hindus said that Somnāth (a Hindu god) was displeased with these idols and that if he had been satisfied with them, no one would have destroyed or injured them. When Yamin-ud-Daulah heard this, he resolved upon making a campaign to destroy this idol, believing that when the Hindus saw their prayers and imprecations to be false and futile they would embrace the faith "†

Allāma Ibn Khaldūn also assigns almost the same motive to the expedition against Somnāth He says —

"Before this whenever Sultān Mahmūd stormed a fort or destroyed an idol, Hindus would say that Somnāth was annoyed with it and therefore allowed it to be destroyed, otherwise he would have killed Mahmūd much earlier

* C H I , III, 23

† K T , IX, 241

From some source Mahmūd received this information and with a view to extirpate idolatry, to prove the helplessness of man-made gods and to belie the claims of the Hindūs, he mobilized his forces against Somnāth ".*

Ferishta also strikes the same note † Sir W Haig follows these authorities and thus expresses Mahmūd's motive in The Cambridge History of India —

"The Brahmans attached to this famous shrine boasted that their master Shīva, the moon-lord, was the most powerful of all the gods and that it was only owing to his displeasure with other gods that the invader had been permitted to plunder and pollute their shrines. This provocative vaunt suggested to Mahmūd the destruction of the temple of Somnāth as the readiest means to a wholesale conversion of idolaters "‡

In other words, the object underlying the expedition against Somnāth was to disillusion the Hindūs and thus bring them within the fold of Islām. How far Mahmūd was moved by religious and how far by politico-economic motives in invading India time and again is a matter of controversy which has been dealt with

* I K, II, vii, 245,

† T F, i, 32

‡ C H I, iii, 23

in a separate chapter * It may, however, be noted here that the motive assigned by the aforesaid historians to the Somnāth expedition is unwarranted in-as-much as the object of the expedition, if it was really to effect a wholesale conversion of Hindūs, was not achieved, nor did Mahmūd try to achieve it even after a complete conquest of the place, though there is no doubt that this expedition, like others, was understood as a Jihād by the common people

On the 18th of October, 1025 A C, Mahmūd started from Ghaznīn and reached Multān on the 9th of the following November. There he took some rest and put his forces in order Leaving Multān on the 26th of the same month, he passed through the desert, stormed the strong fort of Lodorva,† that fell on his way, and reached Anhilwāra about the end of December, 1025 A C At his approach Bhīmdeva, the Rāja of Anhilwāra, fled to the fort of Kandahat,‡ situated in the neighbourhood Mahmūd took

* See Chapter IV infra

† M G , 218

‡ The situation of this fort, which is also written as Khandama, Khandabā, Kandana, Khandana, etc , has taxed the ingenuity of a number of scholars who have indentified it with Kanthkot in Vāgad (East Cutch), Gāndhavī on the Kāthiāwār coast, Gandhār to the north of the Dhadar river, Khandadhar to the north-east angle of Kāthiāwār, and Kanbāhat or Cambay, which bear some phonetic resemblance to it, but none except Kanbāhat (Cambay), which answers well to the description given of it by Ibn-ul-Asīr, seems to be correct (See S I-M. H , 187-88)

possession of the town and then resumed his march to Somnāth Defeating an army of 20,000 Hindus at Mundher (or Mudhera) and overrunning Delvāda near Una on his way, he took his stand before the very gates of the famous shrine on the 6th of January, 1026 A C^f He invested the fortress, which was situated on the seashore and washed by the waves The commander of the fort took to flight and the garrison did not stir out to meet the invaders, believing that their god, "the mighty Someshwar," would completely annihilate the "impious assailants" The Hindus, who had climbed the ramparts to see the besiegers, shouted to the Musalmāns that their god had drawn them to that place in order to destroy them at one blow for the idols they had broken in Hindūstān On the morning of the 7th of January, which was Friday, the fight began and before the time of Juma' prayer the defenders were overthrown by a deadly fusillade of arrows The Musalmāns escaladed the walls of the fort and proclaimed their victory by chanting a call for Juma' prayer The Hindus then entered the temple, prayed fervently to the idol for their success and sallied forth for fighting They delivered a most desperate attack on their enemy and dislodged them from their newly occupied position Next morning (Saturday) Mahmūd renewed the attack with such vigour that the Hindus were driven back to the doors

^f For Mundher and Delvāda, see M G , 215 ff

of the shrine, where a most terrible drama of bloodshed was enacted, so that 'few were left alive' Meanwhile, the neighbouring princes hastened to the rescue of the shrine and on the morning of the following day Mahmūd found his camp surrounded by hostile forces, which were constantly strengthened by fresh reinforcements An irretrievable disaster seemed to be in store for Musalmāns and Mahmūd's position was extremely critical As usual, the Sultān bowed down before Allah in all humility quite as fervently as the Hindūs knelt before the arch-idol, invoking assistance Then rising up and springing into his saddle, as if inspired, he cheered up his soldiers and exhorted them to action with the usual battle-cry of Allah o Akbar, The exhortation had the desired effect, for the Muslims made a most desperate attack, broke through the ranks of the Hindū army and threw it into confusion This victory decided the fate of Somnāth, for thereafter the panic-stricken garrison offered no resistance Mahmūd entered the temple to reap the fruits of his victory Never perhaps were his labours more materially rewarded The idol of Somnāth was broken and the temple was divested of its wealth After a stay of about fifteen days, Mahmūd left for Ghaznī The Rājas of Rājpūtāna, who had been taken unawares by Mahmūd's march through their country, were now advancing under

* For the legend relating to the breaking of this idol by Mahmūd, vide Chapter VI

Virāma or Viryārāma Deva* of Sambhar to block his passage. Avoiding conflict with them, as he did not wish to risk the spoils he had with him, he took a more westerly route and wished to reach Multān through the desert of Sind. He marched northwards till he reached a shallow arm of the sea running between Cutch and Kāthiāwār. With the aid of native guides, who pointed out the passage to him, he led his forces across the channel. This heroic move on his part struck terror into the heart of the Rāja of Anhilwāra who had fled to the fort of Kandahat at the approach of the Muslim army. The Rāja again 'fled from the fortress in mean disguise leaving it at the mercy of the invader who occupied it and captured a number of prisoners. After that Mahmūd resumed his return-march, and proceeded across Cutch. It was there that he was led astray by a Hindū devotee of Somnāth who had offered to act as his guide. Extricating himself from this perilous situation, he safely crossed over to Sind and then marched to Mansūra, whose ruler took to flight. While marching along the Indus towards Multān, Mahmūd and his followers

* Dr M. Nāzim (M G, 119) calls him Parmadeva of Abū, which is a mistake (See S I-V H, 237). Sir W Haig (C H I, iii, 25) has cautiously omitted his name and merely stated that he was the Rāja of Sambhar. Terishta (T F, i, 34) states that he was the Rāja of Ajmer, but Ajmer was not founded till then.

† Farrukhī calls him Khafīf. He was a Carmāthian. See M G, 120)

suffered much at the hands of the Jāts who inhabited that part of the country. It was with great difficulty that the Sultān reached Ghaznī on the 2nd of April, 1026 A.C.

"The expedition to Somnāth," says Dr M. Nāzīm, "is one of the greatest feats of military adventure in the history of Islām. The news of this victory sent a wave of joy all over the Muslim world, and the Caliph heaped titles and honours on the Sultān, his sons and his brother.* Like many other heroes, Sultān Mahmūd became transformed into an almost mythical figure and generations of enthusiastic authors surrounded his name with a huge literature of fanciful stories which were intended to glorify him as a king and a warrior † The idol of Somnāth itself perished but it immortalized the name of Sultān Mahmūd."‡

The last of Mahmūd's Indian expeditions

* On his return from Somnāth the Sultān received complimentary and congratulatory letters from Al-Qādir Billah, the Khalīfa of Baghdād, conferring upon him the title of Kalif-ud-Daulah wa Islām and upon his sons, Mas'ud and Amīr Muhammad, those of Shahāb-ud-Daulah wa Jamāl-ul-Millah and Jalāl ud-Daulah wa Jamāl-ul-Millah respectively and upon his brother, Yusuf, that of Azud-ud-Daulah wa Mu'ayyid-ul-Millah, as well as recognising the Sultān as the ruler of Khurāsān, Hindūstān, Sīstān, Nīmrūz and Khwārizm, and empowering him to nominate his successor.

† For some of these stories, see Chapter VI. Also see 'Awfi's Jawāmi ul Hikājāt, Attār's Kulliyāt, Senāl's Hadiqah, etc.

‡ M.G., 120-21

was directed against the Jāts* who had wantonly molested his army on its return
 (17) Islands from Somnāth It was undertaken in the spring of 1027 A C

of the Indus At the approach of the invader, the Jāts took refuge in an island, enclosed by the smaller channels of the Indus, which could not be waded across and from where they could escape from one island to another in the hour of need Mahmūd was quite on guard against this expediency and had therefore prepared a fleet of 1,400 boats, each of which was armed with three ironspikes—one in front and one on either side Each of these boats carried twenty men armed with bows, arrows, hand-grenades and naptha-balls This fleet was launched on the Indus against the Jāts, who too had made ample preparations and brought a flotilla of 4000† boats, properly manned and equipped When, however, the action began, it is stated, the boats of the Jāts were broken and capsized by the ironspikes with which the boats of their opponents were provided ‡ The victors then landed on the islands, where the Jāts had kept their families for safety, and captured a large booty.

* Alberūnī informs us that the Jāts were the worshippers of linga or phallus (Sachao, II, 104) They were not the inhabitants of the Salt Range in the Punjab, as alleged by some They were the Bhatīs of Bhatner who had migrated to Sind (Burgess A S W I, II, 193)

† According to another account, their number was 8000, which seems to be an exaggeration

‡ How this could be possible puts a strain on our credulity

CHAPTER IV

SULTAN MAHMUD THE GREAT—III

MOTIVES AND RESULTS OF INDIAN INVASIONS

What were the aims and objects of Sultan Mahmud in leading so many expeditions to India and what were the results and effects of those expeditions? This is a question which has been asked and answered too often and while answering which historians have expressed different views, almost all of which are, however, based on a superficial study of Sultan Mahmud's life and character and of the history of his times. We shall deal first with his motives and then with the results of his invasions of India in order to show how far the motives are justified by the results.

Introductory

As regards the motives, there are at present three distinctiveschools of thought

MOTIVES

According to one school, Mahmud was a raider-in-chief who, in order to satisfy his greed for gold, "came, burnt, killed, plundered, captured and went." According to another school, he was "one of the greatest champions of Islam," whose principal aim in invading India was to extirpate idolatry and to propagate Islam at the point of the sword. The third school simply sidetracks by saying that "Mahmud's character was complex" and it is nothing short of a wild goose chase to try to ascertain the inspiring motive. The task is not so difficult as it seems to be at first sight, but in order to arrive at correct conclusions it is necessary to dive deep into the history of his reign and to find out the factors that were directly responsible for his invasions of India. For the sake of clarity and convenience these factors may be studied under the following heads, viz., (1) Political, (2) Economic, and (3) Religious.

Political Factors

Among the political factors that were responsible for Mahmūd's wars in India the following will be found to be the most conspicuous. The first was the non-fulfilment or rather deliberate violation of the terms of the peace-treaty solemnly concluded by Rāja Jaipāl of Lāhore with Amīr Subuktigīn of Ghaznīn after suffering a crushing defeat in a battle in which he himself was the 'aggressor'*. The second was the invasion of Ghaznīn by Jaipāl with a view to win back what Subuktigīn had conquered from him †.

* In the words of Dr Ishwara Topa "The first campaign against India was undertaken in order to effect the recognition of political obligations and to enforce the political supremacy with a view to raising the status and prestige of the Ghaznavide power in the eyes of the Indian Rāja." (Politics in Pre-Mughal Times, 33)

† See supra, pp 50-51. In view of Rāja Jaipāl's previous conduct and breach of faith, etc., I have absolutely no hesitation to believe the statement in the Majma-ul-Ansāb, in which he is shown as the aggressor. Since

The third was the breach of faith on the part of Indian Rājas who, after entering into alliance with the Sultān, betrayed him. It will be remembered that at times Mahmūd contracted friendly relations with Indian Rājas, 'binding them under political obligations'. When these 'obligations' were cast to the corner or broken, he declared war against them and punished them for their betrayal. The fourth was the renouncing of allegiance to the Sultān and the withholding of tributes promised to him by Indian Rājas. When defeated, Indian Rājas owed allegiance to him and agreed to pay him tribute annually. When the promised tribute was withheld and allegiance renounced, Mahmūd marched against them to punish them for their insubordination and to maintain his own political supremacy. The fifth was political betrayal in the form of help given to the enemies of the Sultān. Often Mahmūd's Hindu allies colluded with his enemies and plotted to overthrow him in league with them. This was no less responsible his defeat by Subuktīgīn for the second time he must have been anxious to retrieve his reputation and to wipe off the stigma of repeated reverses and humiliation. The death of Amīr Subuktīgīn supplied him with the long-sought-for opportunity and he must have invaded Ghaznīn to achieve his object—to overthrow the Ghānawīd power and thus maintain his dignity among the Hindu Rājas and his own subjects. His son and successor, Anandpāl, also enacted the same role soon after his accession. He formed a formidable confederacy for the invasion of Ghaznīn and tried to do what his father could not. See supra, pp 59 ff.

for spurring him to take drastic actions against them and to pounce upon their States. The sixth was the molestation of the Sultān's Indian allies by their hostile neighbours. Whenever any Hindū Rājas turned against his allies and attacked them with a view to deprive them of their political power for the simple reason that they owed allegiance to the Ghaznawid Sultān, he had to come to their aid because regard for political obligations and respect for pledges given compelled him to do so. The seventh was the rebellion of his Indian vassals. Defiance of his authority in India by the Rājas of Indian States, who acknowledged his suzerainty, also led him to invade India for suppressing their rebellions and re-establishing his authority.*

The economic factors were quite as strong Economic,— and stimulating as political. The importance of wealth as a means of attaining political power and retaining it is too evident to be dealt with in detail. Suffice it to say that Mahmūd understood the importance and appreciated the miraculous powers of wealth. He knew that it was the very source of political strength and stability and was therefore keen on possessing as much of it as possible. India's fabulous wealth must have stirred his soul and stimulated his ambitions and influenced his course of action. The unbroken series of victories won in India brought in their train a regular downpour of wealth which immensely augmented the Ghaznawid Treasury. The wealth thus acquired was used for the cultural as well as political advancement of the State, and this was mainly responsible for the glory that was Ghaznīn and the might that was Mahmūd. It had no mean share in establishing his authority in his kingdom and his superiority over the kings of the Islamic world in general and of the Indian world in particular. It enhanced the reputation of Ghaznīn all over the world as a centre of power, as a source of light and as a seat of learning and culture. The wealth in his possession must have, moreover, served as a sure bait for the mercenaries who, unless and until they were given enough of it as a reward for their services, would not have accompanied him to his distant expeditions. To finance his schemes successfully, he stood in need of money and India was a veritable *El Dorado.

* These causes have been brought out at their places in Chapter III and here they are just referred to in order to facilitate the discussion.

Before dealing with the religious factors Religious, — which might have served as causes of the Ghaznawid invasions of India, it is necessary to know the tone of Muslim religious life in Mahmūd's times, for he was, after all, a product of his own environments and his actions must have been influenced by the ethical standards then in vogue. A reference, however brief, to the Qurānic conception of State is quite apropos of the subject. The method of government contemplated by the Qur-ān and recommended by the Prophet is theocracy, i.e., a system of social and political control founded on divine laws and sanctions, reflecting the will of God in all its forms and phases, motives and movements. The idea is to Islāmize life in accordance with the laws of the Qur-ān, and to level down all differences and diversities of rank and race and to remove all inequalities, social as well as political. The ideal put before the Islāmic State was to Islāmize the people without injuring the religious susceptibilities of the Zimmīs (non-Muslims). The Prophet of Islām founded a theocratic State and gave a conclusive proof of its practicability. Not long after him, however, reactions set in throughout the Islāmic world and 'shifted the Islāmic political ideal from its fulcrum to an ever-changing political gravitation'. So great in fact was the change that came over the Islāmic world that even the sponsors and stalwarts of Islāmic principles and practices lost respect for them and cared little to safeguard or promote the interests of Islām. With the conquest of Persia and the flow of wealth the theocratic form of government made room for a secular State. The Shariyat ceased to influence politics. On the other hand, it was influenced by political considerations. With the rise of the Ommayyades to power and the transfer of the seat of government to Damascus, the change became more pronounced Amīr Muāwiya resorted to all sorts of means for his political aggrandizement Under him the State was completely secularized Under him the rests of Islām were relegated to the background But for the unique sacrifice of Hussain made at the desert of Karbala, the fate of Islām would have been sealed * Musalmāns—not Islām, as erroneously supposed by some,—had drifted afar from the high ideals set forth by Islām and translated into action by the Apostile leaders easily advanced their political interests and founders of States and not preachers, They were, as a matter of fact, makers, builders propagators or defenders of the Faith, though they often posed to be and not easily passed for such persons Their acts may perhaps be justified politically, but not Islāmically Mahmūd was the product of his environments Quite in keeping with the spirit of the age, he also advanced his political interests under the cloak of religion † Utbī informs us that soon after

* Hence the need and not the greed for gold lay at the root of his Indian invasions

* See T T, vi, 184, I K, II, v, Usād al-Ghaba by Ibn Asir Jazri, iii, 299, 401, Istiāb by Ibn Abdul-Barr, i, 66, 154, Swāiq-i-Mulraqā, 56, 135, Islām under the Arabs by Osborn, and A Short History of the Saracens by Amīr 'Alī, 95

† Clever leaders too often hired the services of corrupt Ulamā who turned and twisted the meaning of some verses of the Holy Qur'ān and interpreted them so as to serve their ends, and to those who were always out to find or forge moral and religious support for their

his recognition as an independent ruler by the Khalifa of Baghdad Mahmud made it obligatory on himself to invade India every year. Modern writers have put a new interpretation on this statement and tried to ascribe religious motivation to what were admittedly political exploits. Their interpretation is not supported or substantiated by historical evidence. The pledge given to the Khalifa was not the only Leitmotif in his invasions of India. It would perhaps be more proper to say that underlying the pledge were political motives and the cries of 'holy wars' etc. were raised to stir up the soldiers to action and to ensure further recruitments. The resolution was made with a view "to please the Khalifa with whom he wished to cultivate most cordial and loyal relations in order to cover the illegitimate revolutionary origin of his dynasty, which was still fresh in the memory of the men of time he maintained the most loyal relations with the spiritual head of Islam, the Khalifa of Baghdad, Al-Kadir (881-422 A.H.), who had clad the usurpation of his family with the mantle of legitimacy and in order to please him he hunted down the heretics in his realm in Khurasan and in Multan, impaling or stoning crusaders, such verses of the sacred text as 'Obey Allah, obey the Apostle and obey those in authority from among you' (S. i., V. 59) and "Do Jihād against the unbelievers" (S. ix., V. 73) were full of possibilities of ingenious interpretations. They fully exploited these verses for gratifying their ends. (See my book on Some Cultural Aspects of Muslim Rule in India, pp. 13, 15-18)

THE GHAZNAWIDS

them. He tried to rid the Khalif of the real or suspected votaries of his opponent, the Anti-Khalif in Egypt, the famous Hakim ^{}. Politically, the Khilafat had become bankrupt and the Khalifa an almost nonentity, but the institution still commanded the respect of the Muslim world and the Khalifa was still 'a useful ally for a warrior who was burning with the desire for expansion'. Political considerations and not religious sentiments were at the root of Mahmud's loyalty to the Khalifa. He obeyed the Khalifa and persecuted the Carmathians and other non-Sunnis, against whom the latter had declared a war, because he wished to win through him the good-will of the Muslim world for strengthening the foundations of his kingdom. In appreciation of his services, the Khalifa heaped upon him and his sons honours and titles which immensely enhanced his prestige in the Muslim world. Gradually, however, as his might and means increased and his name was surrounded by a halo of glory, even this outward respect for the moribund institution was grudging. We hear of at least three great ruptures in his relations with the Khalifa when he decided to shake off the supremacy of that nominal power—

* Sachao's Alberuni. Also see M G, 160-61

† According to Dr M Nâzîm, "The Sultân became less obsequious towards him (Khalifa) and sometimes months passed before Baghdâd was officially informed of his victories" (M G, 165). This change of attitude is evident from the letters addressed by him to the Khalifa and preserved in the Tajârib, iii, 341-44.

for the first time when the Khalīfa refused to give him Samārqand and he threatened him with the invasion of his capital (Bağdād) with one thousand elephants so as to lay it waste and carry its earth to his own capital (Ghaznīn) on their backs, for the second time when Abū 'Alī Hasan (Hasanak) received a robe of honour from al-Zāhir, the Fātimid Khalīfa of Cairo, on his return from a pilgrimage to Mecca and the Khalīfa of Bağdād sent a strongly worded letter to the Sultān, directing him to order the immediate execution of Hasanak on the charge of subscribing to the Carmāthian creed,† and for the third time when he left his son, Mas'ūd, at Rayy with instructions to conquer Isfahān and 'release the Caliph from the bondage of the Buwāihids' with a view 'to bring the Caliph under his sway ‡ On the first occasion he disarmed the opposition of the Khalīfa only by making profuse apologies and adopting a reverential attitude towards him On the second occasion he appeased the Khalīfa by sending Hasanak's robe of honour to Bağdād, where it was burnt to ashes in a public square On the third occasion his death upset his plans and schemes From all that has been said it is clear that he had scant courtesy for the Khalīfa, though he did not want to offend the power which had strengthened his position

* T F, i, 28 and T H, i, 277

† T M, 211-212, K T, ix, 239, and W G, 165

‡ T M, 83 and 359

THE GHĀZNAWIDS

morally and which, even in its hour of weakness,
was strong enough to shake and shatter the moral
foundations of his empire.*

Now that we have acquainted ourselves with the currents and cross-currents of politico-religious history of Mahmūd's times, it has become easy for us to proceed with our inquiry into the motives of Mahmūd in leading so many expeditions against India. But before proceeding with the inquiry it will be proper
to answer the following questions —

(1) Were Mahmūd's invasions of India really Jihāds? (2) Was propagation of Islām in India his chief aim? (3) Was extirpation of idolatry his main object? (4) Was territorial annexation the inspiring motive?

Were Mahmūd's invasions of India Jihāds?—
Were Indian Invasions Jihāds? In order to answer this question Jihād correctly, it is necessary to know what Jihād really means. The word root is Jahid or Julid, which means power, exertion or struggle. The Qur'ānic conception of Jihād is contained in verse 20 of Sūra ix of the Qur'ān, which reads "Those who believe, and suffer exile and strive with might and main, in God's cause with their goods and their persons,
have the highest rank in the sight of God

* See M. G., 160 61

They are the people who will achieve (salvation) ^{}
 Allāma Abdullah Yūsuf Alī has beautifully summed up the meaning of this verse in the following words "Here is a good description of Jihād. It may require fighting in God's cause, as a form of self-sacrifice. But its essence consists in (1) a true and sincere Faith, which so fixes its gaze on God, that all selfish and worldly motives seem paltry and fade away, and (2) an earnest and ceaseless activity, involving the sacrifice (if need be) of life, person or property, in the service of God. Mere brutal fighting is opposed to the whole spirit of Jihād, while the sincere scholar's pen or preacher's voice or wealthy man's contribution may be the most valuable forms of

* This is what the Qurān enjoins. Hostile critics of Islām have taken some stray verses from the Qurān and forced on them interpretations which the text and the trend of the text do not at all bear. For instance, the so called Sūrat us-Saif or "the Sūrat of the Sword" is taken out from the text and interpreted to mean 'war against unbelief,' and argued that Islām enjoins the use of the sword for the spread of the faith. Now if this verse is read with the text that precedes it, the correct meaning becomes quite clear. It then means war against aggressive and perfidious unbelievers and not against all. Going further, it is ordered that war should cease as soon as the opponents sue for peace. Why to enter into a peace before the opponents are done to death or converted to Islām? This militates against the theory of force and conclusively proves that fighting is recommended in Islām only for the preservation of peace. The correctness of this interpretation is warranted by the Qurānic injunctions "Let there be no compulsion in religion", and "Commit no excesses", and by the life of the Prophet and his

THE GHAZIATWOS

Jihād^{*} Looked at in the light of the Holy Qur-an, Mahmūd's expeditions against India cannot be called Jihāds From their very character it appears that they were secular exploits and not religious wars waged for the cause of Islam or in the service of God † Mahmūd's armies were composed of professional soldiers and mercenaries of various denominations and not Mujahids or holy warriors War was the prevailing passion or rather the fashion of the day, and the spirit of the age, not the sanction of the Qur-an, was behind them Incidentally, it may be pointed out here that Mahmūd was not an Amīr as Islam would have it and his was not a State attitude towards the Zimmis, which throw a flood of light on the real significance of Jihād In verse 73 of Sūra ix the Prophet is ordered to "do Jihād against the unbelievers and the hypocrites" And what were the weapons employed by him for that Jihād—kindness, generosity, forgiveness, charity, peace, respect and what not History teems with instances to illustrate this point and they drive us to the conclusion that Jihād means anything but bloodshed for the spread of the faith See Al-Qur'ān, ii, 190-93, 216-17, 243-51, 256, iv, 74, 76, 84, 170; viii, 39, 65, i, 5, 6, 12, 13, 16, 20, 29, 73, 123, xi, 39, 41, and xviii, 4, 20

[‡] The Holy Qur'ān (translated by A Y 'Ali), p. 444, note 1270

† It may be noted here that Islāmic wars are always defensive and in the service of God Islām is always at war against Evil, but as a religion of peace it recommends peaceful methods for fighting it out The use of the sword is permitted in exceptional circumstances, e.g., when the life and liberty of Muslims and their honour and religion are in danger

contemplated by the Qur-an. He was an absolute monarch and his government was far from theocracy. Before launching a campaign against idolatry or Jihad against the infidels, he ought to have Islāmized his own State and acted in accordance with the principles of Islām in the matter of succession to the throne and other important affairs, if he was a true and sincere champion of Islām, as he is supposed to have been.

Like a good Muslim, who is always expected to be an active missionary of his religion, Mahmūd might have felt delighted in the spread of his faith, Propagation of Islām? but that does not seem to have been the only object underlying his Indian expeditions. He was more of a conqueror than a fanatical propagandist, or a pious missionary. To say that he invaded India time and again for the spread of his religion is historically wrong and psychologically untrue. In the first place, there is no scrap of evidence in the contemporary chronicles to show that he ever won converts, whether by force or by peaceful means *. We do come across one or two instances when he is said to have appointed teachers and preachers for the instruction of new converts and Hindūs in the rudiments of Islām †. Whether this was done in response to the dictates of his conscience or out of political motives—, for he had to please and pacify those whom he had brought to India on the pretext of Jihâds or ‘holy wars’—, may remain a matter of moot, but it is abundantly clear that nothing useful was accomplished by him so far as the spread of Islâm in India was concerned “Some râjas are said to have embraced Islâm,” says Dr M Nâzîm, “but they did so most probably as a political shift to escape the fury of the conqueror and returned to their faith as soon as he had turned his back on them.”* This was obviously because the Hindus were not yet told and taught what Islâm was and what it stood for “The period of Sultân Mahmûd,” says the same scholar, “was essentially a period of conquest” and “the time was not yet ripe for missionary work which required settled government”† The policy of conquest and consolidation, it may be observed, was not followed and no attempt was made to establish a settled government in India, otherwise one province, permanently occupied, would have done far more for conversion than all his invasions together The whole of Mahmûd’s time in India was spent in waging wars and amassing wealth and he had little leisure to devote to the sacred cause Consequently; he is not entitled to the ‘credit’ which he has received from his misinformed admirers for the alleged propagation of

* It is a different thing if a Hindū Rāja and his followers embraced Islām to escape defeat and destruction.

† Z A , 72 and 78-79

* M G, 162

† Ibid, 162

Islam in India * Secondly, Islam was not presented to the Hindus in the manner prescribed by the Prophet. In matters of faith it is the method of presentation that matters much and no religion can score success, such as Islam has done, if it is conveyed through the agency of wars and bloodshed † The Prophet of Islam did not

* Ignorant fanatics who extol Mahmud for propagating Islam in India at the point of the sword, which he never did, do him more harm than good and indirectly bring discredit to Islam which enjoins universal toleration and positively forbids the use of force in effecting conversions.

† This point requires some elucidation. Propagation of Islam in India was not the inspiring motive of Mahmud's invasions of India, but there is absolutely no doubt that his Indian expeditions were given out to be and understood as 'Jihads' or holy wars, undertaken for the extirpation of idolatry and the propagation of Islam in India. It is in this sense that Professor Muhammad Habib (S V G, 81) has remarked that "the career of the conquering Ghaznavide created a burning hatred for the new faith in the Hindu mind" because it was presented "in the guise of plundering armies". Dr M Nāzim has misunderstood this remark and therefore criticised it. In his opinion "The Hindus rejected Islam as their national religion because of the fundamental and irreconcilable differences between Islam and Hinduism". The learned Doctor has tried to substantiate his point by saying that "Islam, with its definite articles of faith, could not appeal to the average Hindu to whom religion had never meant any specified set of doctrines". He is sadly mistaken. In my opinion Islam is nothing if not natural and conducive to human welfare—spiritual as well as secular. It was nothing if it failed to appeal to the down-trodden Hindus—Hindus who had been subjected to grave inequalities and who had become fed up with the lot assigned to them by their preach his faith by waging wars and leading expeditions against the infidels Mahmûd, whose knowledge of Islamic theology was undisputed, cannot be said to have been ignorant of such injunctions of the Qur-an as "Lâ ikrâha fid dîn" (Let there be no compulsion in religion) His religious policy was based on toleration and "he is not said to have forced any Hindû to abjure his religion or to have put any person to death for the sake of conscience" * Referring to his religious policy, M Elphinstone tells us that "it is nowhere asserted that he ever put religion A large majority of the Hindûs were in need of a shelter and no religion could provide a better shelter for them than Islâm Their minds were quite open to receive the truth Presented in its proper form and propagated in the manner prescribed by the Prophet, Islâm was sure to reap a rich harvest The subsequent history of Islâm in India bears eloquent testimony to this hard historical fact The only difficulty in its way was the opposition of the Brahmans who had grown fat at the expense of low-caste Hindûs, such as Shudras, because Islâm—with its democratic principles of equality and brotherhood—would have dealt a death-blow to their supremacy, which they so jealously guarded But with the majority of the Hindûs in its favour, it was not difficult to overcome their opposition "The fundamental and irreconcilable differences between Islâm and Hinduism," referred to by Dr M Nâzîm, ought to have facilitated rather than retarded the work of conversion in India, for if Islâm and Hinduism were alike, there was no need for change and conversion would have been out of question,

* P P-M T , 45 "Though zealous for Islâm," says Sir W Haig, "he maintained a large body of Hindû troops, and there is no reason to believe that conversion was a condition of their service" (C H I , iii, 27)

7007

a Hindū to death except in battle or in the storm of a fort ^{} Under him the Hindūs enjoyed perfect religious freedom They were entrusted with highly responsible posts, and religion was not a condition of their service The names of Tilak, Rāi Hindū, Hajrāi and Sonī stand out pre-eminently in the military history of Ghaznī [†] Mahmūd was a conqueror and he drew no hard and fast lines between Hindūs and Muslims in his schemes of conquest Of his Indian expeditions at least two were led against the Muslims for much the same reasons as against the Hindū Rajas, and almost all his Central Asian expeditions were led against Muslims "If he harassed the Hindū rājas of India," says Dr M Nazim, "he did not spare the Muslim sovereigns of Irān and Transoxiana The drama of plunder and bloodshed that was enacted in the sacred Ganges Doab was repeated with no less virulence on the slopes of the Mount Damāwand and the banks of the river Oxus Religious considerations rarely weighed with a conqueror and the Sultān does not appear to have been influenced by them in his schemes of conquest [‡] His transactions with Hindū Rajas were guided entirely by policy, without reference to religion, and he cannot be blamed or praised for what he never did nor attempted to do Was then, it may well be asked now, propagation of Islām his object in leading

^r H I, 293

77 2 F/96 M

1 P P-M T, 46

[‡] M G, 163

his expeditions against India? Emphatically not. Like other kings, who preceded and followed him, Mahmūd did not concern himself with the work of conversion—that was left to saints and savants like Sayyad 'Alī Hujverī and Mu'in-ud-Dīn Chishtī—for his own hands were too full of political pre-occupations to leave him leisure to turn his attention to that side. No honest historian can conceal the truth and no Muslim, acquainted with his faith, can justify Mahmūd's expeditions from religious point of view and call them Jihāds. Far from enjoining or recommending Islām—which means peace, which preaches peace and which stands for universal peace—, does not even countenance but positively forbids the use of force for the spread of the faith and no principle known to the Shariyyat enjoins, recommends, justifies or countenances systematic spoliation of temples and places of worship for the acquisition of wealth.

Mahmūd launched no organized effort to destroy idolatry in India. He attacked shrines, raised temples to the ground and broke idols to pieces* not because it was meritorious from religious

* It may be noted here that in those times the Musal-māns (or rather new converts to Islām) had become so fed up with idolatry and carried such a deep seated prejudice against it that soon after their conversion they made it a point to destroy it root and branch. If, therefore, Mahmūd broke idols at some places, it was most probably in order to please his followers. His expeditions were

point of view, but because they were fortified places, containing treasures of India's fabulous wealth. No temples, other than those of the kind described above, were touched, and once peace was concluded everything was safe and toleration in the widest sense of the word was granted to all and sundry. While referring to "the mundane motives" of Mahmud's Indian invasions, Dr Ishwara Topa says "It may also be observed that the temples of India which Mahmud raided were storehouses of enormous and untold wealth and also some of these were political centres. The temples were, in fact broken during the campaigns for reasons other than religious, but in times of peace Mahmud never demolished a single temple.* If the destruction of temples and

understood as Jihāds (holy wars or wars against unbelief) and hence the historians of that age have also referred to them as such and given full vent to their own religious vanity. Mark the change in the conception of Jihād

* Politics in Pre-Mughal Times, pp 46-47. Dr M Nazim's remarks in this connection are equally interesting. He says "The critics who accuse the Sultan of wanton bloodshed and reckless spoliation of Hindu temples, forget that these so called barbarities were committed in the course of legitimate warfare, when such acts are sanctioned by the practice of all the great conquerors of the world. Spoils captured from a defeated enemy have always been considered the lawful property of the victorious army. In India, however, wealth was accumulated, not only in the coffers of the kings, as in other countries, but also in the vaults of the temples which were consecrated to the service of various deities. The consequence was that, while elsewhere the capture of the defeated monarch's treasury usually gratified the conqueror's lust for marmmon, the extinction of idolatry or the spread of Islām in India were his motive, he ought to have followed that policy in times of peace as well, first in his own country and then outside, and then there was no need to enter into treaties without achieving the object. We know it for certain that the Hindūs enjoyed full toleration under Sultān Mahmūd Al-Ma'arrī informs us that they were granted separate quarters in the Imperial Ghaznīn and allowed to observe their religious ceremonies without any let or hindrance.* In other words, they were quite free to blow their Sankh and to bow before their idols under the very nose of the Sultān.

Was conquest or territorial annexation his chief object? This too is far-fetched, Conquest or for he never contemplated an Indian territorial empire. Perhaps, he knew that a annexation? Muslim empire in an alien country was then almost impossible, that it would involve a great waste of men and money if he tried to hold in subjection a race hostile in religion and language, customs and traditions, tastes and temperaments, habits and hobbies, and that it was beyond the range of practical politics to establish his sway in Central Asia as well as in India simultaneously. Nor does permanent annexation seem to have been his principal motive. The annexation of a part of the Punjab and some other places such as Sind and Multān, which lay contiguous to the Ghaznavid Empire, proves rather than refutes his non-territorial designs. The Punjab was annexed, because with it as a base Mahmūd could successfully attack the places beyond His western campaigns, on the other hand, disclose a different policy—that of acquisition and annexation, conquest and consolidation. At times, when necessary, he himself, even when his health did not permit, supervised the expeditions undertaken against his enemies and tried to establish his sway in the newly conquered territories in the west, not so in the east.

* "In India temples were also ransacked to secure the piles of gold and precious stones in them" (M.G., 163)

The inspiring motive
What it may then be asked, was the inspiring motive? The establishment of a Turko-Persian or Central Asian empire and nothing beyond that was the chief motive of Mahmūd's Indian invasions, which were undertaken for the realization of that object. In the first place, they gave him the much-needed appellation of "holy warrior" and enhanced his prestige in the Muslim world, and secondly, they cemented his strength and constituted a great financial asset to his military resources. In other words, his Indian expeditions were undertaken for political as well as economic purposes,* and in many respects they were justified, for in the first clash between the Hindūs and the Musalmāns in the reign of Subuktigīn the former were the aggressors and when defeated and reduced to submission they renounced allegiance, formed confederacies to stem the rising tide of the Ghaznawids and fought against Mahmūd

* Professor M. Habib is perfectly right in saying that "Islam sanctioned neither the vandalism nor the plundering motives of the invader," but I do not find it possible to

Sultān Mahmūd invaded India time and again and conquered a number of places. Almost the whole of Northern India felt the force of his arms, but the results of his victories were far from permanent. The one permanent result of his seventeen successful invasions of India was that only a few of the places he had conquered there, were permanently annexed to the Empire of Ghaznīn, for after his death only a portion of the Punjab, Sind and some parts of the adjoining provinces, such as Multān, acknowledged his suzerainty. Elsewhere in India, the results of his expeditions and of a series of

agree with him when he says that Mahmūd's attacks on India were "un-called for" and that "the Hindu princes had done Mahmūd and his subjects no harm" (S M G, 79) See supra, pp 85 ff, where I have made it abundantly clear that the Hindūs were the aggressors and that they themselves were responsible for exciting the hostilities of the Ghaznawids. The Ghaznawids paid them in their own coin with, of course, compound interest. If they had not done so, the Hindūs would have enacted the role of conquerors and the fate of the Ghaznawids would have been sealed. This is what my reading of the original sources has led me to.

victories soon wore off. His rule did not take root in the places he conquered and the Rājpūts re-established their rule in Northern India, excepting the few places referred to above, and continued to rule for about two centuries more. Thus, while Amir Subuktigīn had left Peshawar as an outpost of Ghaznīn, his more celebrated son and successor, Sultan Mahmūd, left the Punjab as an outpost of his far-flung Central Asian empire. This was the net-result of his seventeen expeditions of India so far as conquest or territorial annexations were concerned.

But the effects of Mahmūd's invasions of India were far more enduring than EFFECTS— their results Politically.—These expeditions paved the way for the establishment of a permanent Muslim empire in India by flinging open its gates to the subsequent Muslim invaders, by exposing the weaknesses of the Indian political and military systems and by establishing the superiority of the Musalmāns over the Hindus in the art of war, discipline and devotion to duty. Economically.—They were a heavy drain on India's age-long accumulated wealth. They made India much poorer and contributed vastly to the glory and grandeur that was Ghaznīn. They were a great financial asset to Mahmūd's military programme, because they immeasurably augmented his resources and ensured his success by enabling him to finance his schemes of conquest without experiencing any difficulty. Culturally.—They brought two great civil

~~THE GHAZNAWIDS~~

Islam and Hindūism—into contact and led to mutual intercourse between Hindūs and Musalmāns. In the train of Muslim warriors and warlords came Muslim saints and savants who permeated the ranks of Indian society, propagated Islam in India and won a number of converts. In a land of idolaters, littered with temples, containing myriads of man-made gods and sounding with temple bells, mosques were founded and cries of Lā-ilāhā-illallaho Muhammād-ur-Rasūl-ullah (There is no God but Allah and Muhammad is His prophet) and Allah o Akbar (God is Great) began to sound and pronounce the unity of God. But for the successful invasions of Sultan Mahmūd it would have been well nigh impossible for the Muslim missionaries to settle down in India and carry on their work peacefully. Their importance from Islamic point of view lies in the fact that they indirectly facilitated the future progress of Islam in India. But this had nothing to do with the motives of Mahmūd and we are not prepared to assign him any credit for what he never did nor aimed to do.

CHAPTER V

SULTAN MAHMUD THE GREAT—IV

CULTURAL ACTIVITIES OF HIS REIGN

Great as a conqueror, fit to rank with the greatest conquerors of the world like Alexander the Great Mahmud was equally great as a man of culture and refinement. His achievements in the arts of peace were on a par with his victories in the science of war and compare favourably with those of Cæsar Augustus. An attempt is made in this chapter to bring out in brief the contributions he made to the cause of Islāmic culture and civilization.

In order to appreciate his work, it is necessary to have an idea of his tastes. Mahmud's love of learning We have already said something about his education in connection with his early life.* In continuation of that account it may be observed that he grew up to be a good scholar and a fine poet.† Some of his poetical compositions are preserved by 'Awfi in his Lubāb-ul-Albāb ‡ He was very fond of Islāmic law and Tradition and his proficiency in these subjects was recognized even

* See supra, pp 24-26

† M G , 156-57, and Lubāb ul-Albāb, II, 24

‡ Lubāb-ul-Albāb, II, 24

by the most practised theologians of the day. Fiqh seems to have been his most favourite subject, for his name is intimately associated with the authorship of a standard work on the subject, called *Tasrif ul Fiqh Allāma Ibn Khalkān informs us that Imām-ul-Haramain Abul Ma'āli Abdul Mulk Jawāīn has recorded in his work entitled Mughis ul-Khalq fi Ikhīyār-ul-Haq that Mahmūd was deeply interested in Aḥādīth (Traditions), that Ulamā, possessing a profound knowledge of the subject, used to meet at his Court and recite Aḥādīth in his presence, and that he listened to them with great avidity and asked them to explain the points which he did not understand †

Himself a scholar and a poet and a true lover of learning, Mahmūd was in patronage of letters a position to judge and appreciate literary merits, and hence he rose to be one of the greatest patrons of letters. The literary renaissance of Persia found in him a most powerful exponent and his contributions to the development of Persian literature assign him a high place in the literary history of Persia. His patronage of Persian literature has rarely

* Some scholars have expressed doubts about Mahmūd's authorship of the book, but there is nothing improbable in it (See M G , 157 note)

† Tārīkh-i-Ibn Khalkān (Eng ed), II, 86, and I K , II, III, (Translator's note), 256 ff

‡ L H P , I, II, S A , I, and S P L

been surpassed * Like many a Muslim king he loved the society of learned men and used to invite them to his Court from distant countries † His bounty attracted a large number of scholars to Ghaznīn and made it a centre of light and learning for all Asia While the French Napoleon used to import the choicest works of art and literature from the countries he conquered to add to the beauty and grandeur of Paris, the Ghaznawid Napoleon fetched over to his beloved Ghaznīn the artists, scholars and poets in person from the regions he reduced to his sway in order to enhance the splendour of his famous Court He accorded a most warm welcome to learned refugees from all climes and countries and took care to carry out their wishes Whenever he conquered a new town, he at once transported to his capital all the choicest works of art and literature obtained from its libraries and museums and thus augmented the wealth of art and literature already accumulated there ‡ The celebrated author of the Tarikh-i-Gusidah informs us that he spent a sum of not less than 400,000 dīndars per year

* Barthold's view (Turkestan, 289) that Mahmud's patronage of learning was due to an ostentatious desire to convert his Court into a cradle of culture and not to an innate love of learning is erroneous and ill-founded Mahmud might have been influenced by this ulterior motive, but in view of the fact that he was himself a scholar, a poet and an author, it cannot be said that his love of learning was not genuine

† T M, 232-33, 245 and 247

‡ K T, 11, 262

on the literary luminaries of his realm * Ferishta would have us believe that no King had ever gathered more learned men at his Court than Mahmūd † M Elphinstone says that "he showed so much munificence to individuals of eminence that his capital exhibited a greater assemblage of literary genius than any other monarch in Asia has ever been able to produce" ‡ Dr M Nāzim assures us that "his meanest rewards were calculated in thousands of dīnārs, and the later generations of poets have cherished his memory as a giver of elephant-loads of gold and silver" § This is enough to indicate the extent of Mahmūd's literary interest and now we shall make a short reference to the progress of Persian language and literature under his patronage..

The Arab conquest of Persia was fraught with far-reaching consequences. With the transfer of the seat of Islamic Government to Baghdād, the cultural centre of gravity also shifted there, and Persian ideas and ideals began to flow fast into the ranks of Muslim society to change its outlook on life and letters. When the Arabs came into close contact with the Persians, they took an unusual fancy to the culture of the conquered and in their eager fascination for it

* T G , 395

† T F , 1, 22

‡ H I , 290

§ M G , 158

they forgot to pick and choose from Persian ideas. They assimilated them wholesale in almost every department of administration and in every sphere of social life. Politically, they adopted the system of Persian government—division and organization of the various departments of the State, their names and functions, the entire paraphernalia of Persian monarchy—the personality of the Persian King, his seraglio, his slaves, his servants, State ceremonials and all other symbols of sovereignty. Socially, they imbibed Persian ideas of social pleasures and pastimes and took over from the Persians their chase, chess and Chaugān (polo), drinking, music and songs, and even their national spring festival of Nauroz. Culturally they made Persian their Court language and took almost all Persian ideas, including Ta'bīr or the science of interpreting dreams. Here we are chiefly concerned with the cultural side of this all-embracing influence.* In a nut-shell, Persian language and literature received a new lease of life as a result of this change. When, after the fall of the Abbāsid Khilāfat, the Sāmānids established their sway in Transoxiana and extended it to Turkistān, Isfahān and Khurāsān, Persian superseded Arabic and became the language of the court and the country. The Tārīkh-s-Tabarī, a standard work on Islāmic history, was translated into Persian from Arabic by the Vazīr of one of the Sāmānids in 946 A C and poets like

* For some more details, see my book on "Some Cultural Aspects of Muslim Rule in India, pp 6 ff

Rūdīkī* began to use Persian as their medium of expression. The Sāmānid Kings were great patrons of Persian language and literature, and poetry in particular made much progress under their patronage. The fall of their dynasty left the literary luminaries unremunerated and they flocked eagerly to Ghaznīn, the new home of light and learning and the new cradle of the sage and the scholar. There they were accorded a most warm welcome and there they found full scope for the display of their talents. It would be impossible, even if the author were competent, to do full justice to the subject within the scope of a small chapter †. Attention is therefore focussed on the achievements of some of the most important scholars and poets who flourished under the patronage of Sultān Mahmūd, contributed vastly to Persian literary culture and immortalized the name of their Imperial patron.

The versatile Abū Rihān Muhammad bin
Ahmad, known to history as Al-
Alberūnī Alberūnī (the foreigner), comes first
in order of importance. He was

* He received 80,000 dirhams from a Sāmānid Prince for a moral work (H I, 290 foot-note)

† Competent scholars like Browne, Shibli and Azad have written volumes on the subject and the more inquisitive readers would find much to quench their thirst for knowledge within their works entitled A Literary History of Persia, Shir-ul-'Ajam and Sukhandān-i-Pāras respectively. The Tazkarat-us-Shu'ara by Amīr Daulat Shāh also contains much useful information on the subject, chiefly on poetry.

decidedly the most shining star in the firmament of Mahmūd's literary world. As a versatile genius, he was un-equalled, unapproached and unrivalled. At once an astronomer, philosopher, geographer, mathematician, chronologist and a profound scholar of Sanskrit, Alberūnī's mind was indeed "encyclopaedic". He was brought from his native Khwārizm as a captive, thrown into prison and subsequently exiled into Hindūstān on that life of travel and tour to which we owe the immortal Tahqīq-ma-lil-Hind, which is a veritable mine of information about the life and thought of contemporary India. He travelled all over India, applied his vigorous intellect to the study of the language of the Hindus, their arts and sciences, their philosophy and literature, their customs and traditions, in short, the entire paraphernalia of their civilization, and embodied his observations in a book which is a great asset to the study of Hindū history and an indispensable source of information. The philosophic and scientific spirit that animates Alberūnī in the laborious and sympathetic treatment of his subject on an alien culture is a complete contrast to the pride and prejudice of the narrow-minded scholars of the West and serves as an imperishable index to the intellectual character of Islām and the catholicity of Muslim mind. In return for his knowledge of their customs and traditions, their thoughts and ideas, he communicated to the people of India the wisdom of the Baghdādian school*. His work on astronomy, called Al-qanūn-al-Mas'ūdī, or "the Canon Masudicus" after the name of his Imperial patron, Sultān Mas'ūd, is a milestone of literary research and a monument to his memory. His Tahqīq mā-lil-Hind,* which amply manifests the extent to which the Muslim scholars had turned the treasures of Greek lore to fruitful purposes, is an embodiment of well-digested erudition and untiring industry. His another great work, which deserves specific mention, is the Asar ul-Baqīya or "the Vestiges of the Past"†. He also translated into Arabic the Sanskrit work entitled Karanātīlaka by Vijayānanda, son of Jayānanda, of Benāres, and renamed it Ghurrat-uz-Zījat. Besides these master pieces of literature, he wrote many other books on different subjects, such as astronomy, mathematics, geography, physics and chemistry.

* The Spirit of Islām, Amīr 'Alī, 380, O H I, 194

Abū Nasr Muhammad bin Muhammad al-Jabbār al-'Utbī ‡ was a distinguished historian and penman attached to the Court of Sultān Mahmūd. He wrote a history of the reign of his Imperial

* This work has been translated into English by Dr E C Sachau under the title "Alberīnī's India". The original title of the work is Tahqīq-mā-lil-Hind and not Tārikh-ul-Hind or Tārikh i-Hind, as wrongly given in some books, e.g., E & D, p 1, and Encyclopædia of Islām, 1, 726.

† This work also is translated by Dr E C Sachau under the title 'The Chronology of Ancient Nations'.

‡ For his life and work, see al-'Utbī in Ency. of Islām.

patron, entitled Kitāb-ul-Yamīnī or Tārīkh-s-Yamīnī which though deficient in dates and details, is still an indispensable authority on the life and work of Sultān Mahmūd. From literary point of view it is very ornate and the author seems to have concentrated more on the beauty of style and diction than on historical data and dates of important events.

Among others who deserve specific mention in this hurried survey were Al-Others Farabī, the famous philosopher who was considered 'a second Aristotle' by the Arabs of his day and honoured and prized by Mahmūd the more since the refusal of his precursor, Abū 'Alī Sīnā (Avicenna)* who was 'undoubtedly one of the greatest thinkers and physicians the world has produced', to join his Court, Abdul Malik bin Muhammad bin Ismā'il as-Salabī, the learned author of a metrical history of Irān from the earliest times to the reign of Sultān Mahmūd, called Kitāb fī Ghurar-s-Akhbār-s-Muluk-ul-Furs,† Abul Fazl Muhammad bin Hussain al-Baihaqī,‡ the

* On his refusal to accept Mahmūd's invitation, he was hunted down from place to place till at last he found a safe asylum with one of the Buwāhid rulers of Rayy, who was a great patron of Persian literature (L H P i, 95 ff)

† Originally this work covered four volumes. Of them, only the first two have survived and the other two have disappeared. The two that have survived deal with the pre-Islāmic period and the Prophet Muhammad.

‡ For his life and work, see Ency. of Islām, i, 592 reputed author of the Maqāmat-i-Abn Nasr-i-Mushkāni,* the Majalladat and a collection of important diplomatic correspondence of Sultān Mas'ūd and probably of Mahmūd as well, called Zinat-ul-Kuttab,† Mahmūd-al-Warrāq, the author of a universal history ending with the year 1018 A C,§ and Hilāl bin Muḥassīn bin Ibrāhīm as-Sabi, the author of the Zā'il Tajārib-ul-Umām, containing in detail the letters of victory sent by the Sultān to the Khalifa of Baghdaḍ ¶

* This work, now no longer extant, contained much useful information on the reign of Sultān Mahmūd, as is evident from the extracts preserved in the Jawāmi'i al-Hikāyat and Asār-ul-Wuzarā

† This was a monumental work, covering as many as 30 volumes. It was a most comprehensive history of the Yāmīni Dynasty (Sultān Mahmūd and his successors), beginning from the year 1018 A C, and coming down to 1068 A C. Only the second half of the 6th volume and volumes 7-9 and a part of the 10th volume, dealing with the reign of Sultān Mas'ūd, are preserved and the rest lost. Several parts of this work were known after the names and titles of the Ghaznawid rulers. For instance, the part dealing with the reign of Mahmūd was named Tārikh-i-Yāmīni after his title (Yāmin ud Daulah) and that dealing with the reign of Mas'ūd was called Tārikh-i-Mas'ūdi after his name. The Tārikh-i-Yāmīni is a most valuable work and its importance lies in the fact that it was based on original State papers and a diary which its author used to keep.

‡ This work too has been lost (M G, 2)

§ T M, 317. Also see M G, 3

¶ A part of this chronicle, covering an account of three years (390 2 A H), has survived. It has been published by Professor D S Margoliouth in the third volume of the Tajārib ul-Umām of Abu 'Alī Ahmad bin Muḥammad Miskawayh

delicacy and tenderness that characterize others and the Homeric simplicity that pervades most of it. The most striking feature of the book was the absence of Arabic words and phrases, but it has undergone so many changes and suffered so much in diction that it is now conspicuous for the absence of this feature. The constructive genius of Firdausī achieved victories far more enduring than those of his master. The Ghaznawid Empire built by the latter crumbled to dust a decade after his death, but the Shāhnāmeh, the crowning achievement of Firdausī, will live for ever as a monument to his memory.

'Unsari,^{*} the scientist, philosopher, linguist and, with the possible exception of Firdausī, the greatest genius of the age, next engages our attention. He may be mentioned as the best instance of a man raised to honour and affluence for literary merits alone. His extemporaneous effusions, his odes and encomiums, his voluptuous metaphors and, above all, his pure and powerful diction, exquisitely polished and extremely charming, assign him a place second only to that of Firdausī in the history of Persian poetry. He versified the victories and conquests of Sultān Mahmūd, and this part of his work is very useful for historical purposes. In recognition of his services and in appreciation of his merits, he was

* His full name was Hasan bin Ahmad

honoured with the title of Malak-us-Shu'ara (poet-laureate) and entrusted with the work of looking through the poetical compositions of all the accomplished poets of the kingdom before being submitted to the Sultān. This enhanced his prestige and influence and also raised him to honour and title. He left behind a aiwan of about 80,000 verses *

Among other poets who flocked to Ghaznī and flourished at the Imperial Court, Other poets the most distinguished were Daqiqī, who had first undertaken the stupendous task of writing the Shāhnāmeh and had composed more or less 1,000 verses, Ghazārī Rāzī, to whom a reference has already been made, Asadī Tūsī, the honoured teacher of Firdausī, who is said to have completed the Shāhnāmeh by contributing as many as 4,000 verses, 'Asjadi Marvī, Farrukhī Tirmīzī and Minūchihī Balkhī †

The preceding account, though exceptionally brief and perfunctory, is, however, Criticism enough to convey the idea that the of poets age of Sultān Mahmūd was an age of literary efflorescence when poetry in particular progressed by leaps and bounds. Some of the poets attached to the Ghaznawid Court, especially those referred to above, were renowned all

* Vide T. S., Tabqa-i Awwal

† For a detailed account of these and many other poets, see Ibid., L H P, i and ii, T F, i, 38-39, S P L, T S, and S A, Vol I

over Asia and their presence at Ghaznīn, highly prized by the Sultān, was responsible for raising the reputation of the Imperial patron to the highest water-mark. It is true that mystic ideas had not yet gained a wide currency and the Ghazal had not yet been invented; and that the poetry, though brilliant, was not deep, yet the Ghaznawid poets possessed, in spite of their short-comings, a certain amount of freshness and candour which the succeeding generations of poets have frequently lacked *

As a man of culture and refinement, endowed with an intuitive love of learning and intellectual institutions an instinctive admiration for everything that is beautiful in art and literature, Mahmūd's magnanimity was not confined to literary sphere alone, but also found a most suitable expression in the establishment of such intellectual institutions as *maktab*s and *madrasah*s, mosques and monasteries, museums and libraries. He founded the celebrated "Celestial Bride"—a mosque of matchless beauty and grandeur—, built of marble and granite, at his capital and furnished with gold and silver lamps, candelabras, precious ornaments and costly carpets. This magnificent mosque was in that age "a wonder of the east"—a sobriquet which it richly deserved †. In the vicinity of this sacred structure the Sultān

* See L H P, i, ii, S. A, i, and S P L

† T F, i, 30, and H I, 292

established a big university and provided it with a vast library and a fine museum. The library was stocked with numerous literary treasures in various languages and the museum enriched with invaluable antiquities. The mosque was surrounded by as many as 3,000 quarters meant for the residence of teachers and students of the university. The teachers were paid regular salaries and the students were granted stipends and scholarships from the State funds and the income of the mosque and its endowments *

Sultān Mahmūd had a fine taste for architecture. ✓ He spent huge sums of money on the construction of magnificent monuments with a view to beautify his beloved Ghaznīn. He imported distinguished architects from distant countries and employed them in giving a suitable expression to his architectural designs. His example was followed by his nobles who vied with one another and even emulated their king in erecting superb edifices. The result was that Ghaznīn became a nucleus of Islāmic architecture in Central Asia †

Among the public works of a vast and varied Public Works description erected under the instructions of Sultān Mahmūd

* Tārikh-i-Ibn Khalkān, II, 86, T.F., I, 30, and H.I., 290

† T.F., I, 30, Indian as well as Persian architecture together — not one to the exclusion of the other — seems to have influenced Mahmūd's tastes for architecture. (Vide C.H.I., III, 574)

may be mentioned aqueducts, reservoirs, cisterns, porches, bridges and dams. The most prominent of all these were a market at Balkh, a bridge over the Oxus and the Band-i-Sultān across the river Nawar, about eighteen miles north of Ghaznīn. Of these only the last-named has survived and that too, though still in use, is much damaged.*

Ghaznīn Past and Present

Unfortunately, however, the Ghaznīn of these days is a complete contrast to the Ghaznīn of the days of Sultān Mahmūd. Once the historic capital of the great Ghaznawid Empire and the cradle of Islamic culture, it is now a collection of kachā houses, wearing the appearance of an ordinary Afghān town of limited population. So complete in fact seems to have been the spoliation to which it was subjected by 'Alā-ud-Dīn Hussain, surnamed Jahānsuz or "world-burner", and later vandals that nothing but the tombs of a few kings, two towers of victory—one built by Mahmūd and the other by his son, Mas'ūd—, and the shrines of saints and savants have survived to give us an idea not so much of the glory that was Ghaznīn as of the misfortunes that befell it †

* See Ghaznī in EiB, H I. E A, 494-97, and M G, 166.

† For some details on the architectural remains at Ghaznīn, see my article under the caption "Impressions of Ghaznīn" in C & M G, Lahore, dated the 1st September, 1938. Also see H I E A, 494-97, C H I, III, 574-75, and E B.

The tomb of Amir Subuktigin is situated near the modern town of Ghaznīn Tomb of Subuktigin, Mahmud, & 3 other Kings on the Kābul Ghaznīn Rōd his a small but beautiful dome over it Its epitaph is in Kāfic characters * The Rauzah (tomb) of Sultan Mahmud is further up on an elevation, having a modest garden around it † It is also built of white marble and is crowned with a newly constructed dome Its epitaph is in Kāfic script invoking the mercy of God on the noblest Amir, the greatest king the Lord of Church and Sate, Abul Qasim Mahmud bin Subuktigin The outer gate, with a long corridor to the right opening into the enclosure seems to be a later addition The doors that formerly adorned the tomb are now to be seen in the Agra Fort, where they were removed by the British in 1842 A.C. They

* This tomb is not mentioned by the modern writer Even Sir J Marshall, Dr J Ferguson and Dr M Nazim are silent about it All that they have said about in their works are the tombs of Mahmud and Masud and the two towers of victory None of the nobis in other than these finds place in any modern work known to me Even the Encyclopædia Britannica does not go beyond referring to the above mentioned tombs and towers The little that is mentioned about these too seems to be based on hear say reports and is therefore full of mistakes and inaccuracies Compare it with my account in "Impressions of Ghaznīn", which is based on personal observations, and mark the mistakes

† The village that has sprung up round the tomb is known as Rauzah i Sultān

are made of deodār wood, richly carved and containing beautiful inscriptions in Kūfic script * The tombs of three other kings, viz., Abdur Razzāq, Abdul Fateh and Ulughbeg, are also situated in the same neighbourhood. They are crowned with a common dome. The names of the three kings are inscribed on a tile of white marble, which is fixed in a wall of the domed structure. Both the tombs and the dome are in a dilapidated state.†

* Mas'ūd had raised a beautiful mausoleum over this tomb and created vast endowments for its maintenance (T M, 310) The tomb was held in such esteem by the people that even the 'world-incendiary', 'Alā-ud-Dīn Hussain, did not include it in the wholesale destruction of Ghaznī ordered by him "His tomb has however, suffered from the ravages of his Muslim admirers, who for ages have resorted to it for the purpose of seeking divine grace and have carried away to their homes fragments of wood or handfuls of earth as keep-sakes, from the sacrilege of the savage hordes of Hulāgū Khān, and in more recent times, from the misguided enthusiasm of Lord Ellenborough, who, believing that its gates were those of the temple of Somnāth, ordered them to be removed and brought back to India." (M G, 124, foot-note) "Once a grand edifice", the tomb became a cluster of "dilapidated ruins" later on and has been repaired and renovated by the Afghān Government only recently. It is no longer in "dilapidated ruins", as stated by Dr M Nāzīm (M G, 167 and 124, f n)

The legend that the gates of the tomb had been taken away by Mahmūd from Somnāth is devoid of historical foundation and is fantastically absurd (H I E A, 496, f n)

† Some scholars have omitted these tombs and mentioned those of Mas'ūd and Ibrāhīm, which I could not trace

Quite close to the city is a cluster of tombs surrounded by orchards and vineyards. The most prominent of these shrines are those of Ramzān bin Yūsuf alias Shāh Rūm, Majdūd* alias Hākim Sānāī and Khāqānī†—all lying side by side under a common dome which is a later addition. Sa'dī's famous poem in Arabic, extolling the virtues of Muhammad, the Prophet of Islām, is inscribed on the tomb of Sānāī ‡. Among numerous other tombs that are interspersed in the valley may be mentioned those of Bahlol Dānā, Shams-ul-'Arifīn, Jam-i-Auliyā and Shaikh 'Attār. Most of the shrines that have survived have lost all marks of recognition and cannot be identified at this distant date §.

* The full name of this famous poet-philosopher was Abul Majd Majdūd bin Adam al-Sānāī. (T S)

† His full name was Abul Fuzalā Afzal-ud-Dīn Khāqānī (T S).

‡ The opening verses of this poem are —

نَعَ الْعَلِيُّ نَعَمَا لَهُ - كَشْفَ الْكَوْحَى سَهَّالَهُ

حَسَبَ حَمِيعَ دَهَّارَهُ - صَلُو عَلَيْهِ وَ لَهُ

§ It may be noted here that the Afghān Government is deeply interested in the preservation of these sacred remains and relics of the past and its interest has found a most suitable expression in the repairs and renovation of architectural remains lying scattered all over Afghānistān.

CHAPTER VI

SULTAN MAHMUD THE GREAT—V

SOME LEGENDS ABOUT HIM

A number of anecdotes are afloat about Sultān Mahmūd's career and character
Introductory Few of them have yet been subjected to the rigours of criticism and the result is that they are freely quoted by competent scholars as well as by mediocres to illustrate certain traits of Mahmūd's character * Of them, the four most famous legends that have gained a wide currency and given birth to a series of wild charges against Mahmūd are those about Firdausī, Ayāz, the idol of Somnāth and the two Dabish-lims Here it is proposed to take up these four legends to scrutinize them at some length and to examine their sources, because they are responsible for giving a wide vogue to some curious notions about Mahmūd's character and work

* Dr M Nāzim has dealt with some of these stories and tried to expose their spuriousness in his learned monograph on Mahmūd of Ghazna (pp 219 ff), but about Firdausī and Ayāz he has contented himself by drawing the attention of his reader to the articles of Professor M Khān Shirānī in the "Urdū" (quarterly journal) about Mahmūd's relations with Firdausī and characterizing Mahmūd's "attachment" to Ayāz as based on latter's "extraordinary devotion" and not on "good looks" despite the fact that both these stories have done much harm to the reputation of his hero

We take the legend of Firdausī first. It is to the effect that this famous poet Legend of Firdausī was commissioned by Sultān Mahmūd for writing the Shahnamah (Book of Kings) in poetry and promised a gold dinar for each verse composed, that when the great epic was completed the Sultān paid the poet in silver instead of the promised gold, that the poet refused to accept the baser metal, retired from the Imperial Court in disgust and composed a satire against his niggardly patron, that sometime later the Sultān repented of his cavil and sent more than the promised money to Firdausī, that the poet was no longer in the land of the living at that time, and that the poet had a daughter whom the money was offered but she refused to accept it. Taking their cue from this story and the satire, some stupid scholars have gone even so far as to declare that Mahmūd "was a bastard" and others, e.g. Sir W. Haig, have contented themselves with the statement that he was "the son of a concubine and not a regularly married wife", while all are almost invariably agreed on the charge of avarice.

Professor M. Hābib has also written a book on Mahmūd, but he has quietly passed over these stories. In a foot-note (S.M.G., 62) he has referred to the articles of Professor Shirānī. There is, thus, no work in English in which these stories have been subjected to a critical examination. I have, therefore, thought it proper to devote some space to them. I may add here that I have not had the opportunity of reading Professor Shirānī's articles despite sounding all possible sources.

and breach of promise against him

Almost all the available sources of this story are materially discrepant and 1 Information contradictory. They differ in almost Contradictory all details. Even the name, nativity, parentage, dates of birth and death of Firdausī as well as of commencement and completion of the Shāhnāmeh by him, his age and education, his life and religious beliefs, nay the number of verses that the Shāhnāmeh contained, the circumstances that surrounded Firdausī's access to the Imperial Court and presentation of the book as well as Mahmūd's order to write that book and his perfidy and final repentance are differently given in different accounts*. In the presence of such a confused mass of conflicting and contradictory evidence it is wholly unsafe to accept the story at its face value.

Secondly, there is absolutely no reference to the story in the chronicles of the 2 Sources secondary & devoid of authority contemporary Persian and Arab historians who have left behind detailed accounts of the reign of Sultan Mahmūd. The Persian historian, 'Aini, who was a contemporary of Sultan Mahmūd, says nothing about it. The celebrated author of the Allāh o Malakum Min Magāla Maqbul, another contemporary critic of Mahmūd, who was so unsparing and even unnecessarily extravagant in his criticism that he must have fully exploited the story and the satire only if they had been correct and current in his times, makes no mention of it. In short, the whole of the contemporary historical literature is silent on the subject and no writer of that age has even alluded to it. How, it may then be asked, did the story originate and gain currency subsequently? The story first appears in the Chahār Maqāla, where it is not based on any authority*. It is from this solitary source that the story must have been reproduced in the subsequent literature. It is necessary to note here that the book just referred to was written by Nizāmī al-'Arūzī, a court-poet of the Ghūrids, about 150 years after the death of Sultān Mahmūd and the probability is that it was concocted by him in order to please his patrons, the Ghūrids, between whom and the Ghaznawids existed a bitter enmity, or if it was not his work, it might have been incorporated in his book later on, for the literature of that age and of the age that followed is not entirely unmixed and intact†. Again, the Chahār Maqāla is full of historical mistakes and mis-statement of facts‡.

* Vide M.F., 34 ff., and L.H.P., II, 129 ff.

* C M , 72, ff

† The Diwān-i-Hāfiż, the Gulistān and the Kulliyāt-i-Shams Tabrīz are the instances in point. One reason for the changes in the books of those times, as apart from malicious intentions, is that literature suffered enormously during the tumultuous times that followed the death of Mahmūd. Changes such as we have come across may have crept in while the books were rewritten.

‡ Vide M F , 27, ff,

At present there are several MSS of this book and they are all full of material discrepancies Even the authorship of the book is a subject of controversy* It is therefore unsafe to place implicit reliance on what is stated in it and is not supported by other sources Yet again, the language and style of the story of 'Mahmūd and Firdausī' are quite different from those of the other contents of the book (Chahār Maqāla), so much so that they cannot be attributed to one and the same author Any one acquainted with Persian language and literature will easily discover the difference and find that the language and style in which the story is written are far inferior to those of the book in general T Almost everywhere in the book Mahmūd's name is mentioned with respect but not so in the story The absence of the story in the literature of a period no less than a century and a half also shows that it is a later fabrication The story itself is not free from flaws For instance Nizāmī al-'Arūzī, the author of the Chahār Maqāla, informs us that Firdausī was a man of means and lived a comfortable life,‡ while Firdausī himself complains of his poverty § At another place in the same story al-'Arūzī says

* M F., 24

T Ibid, 32-3

‡ C M, 77

§ The relevant verses are -

و دیگر نه لعنه دعا دار نیست - مرا این رفع را کس دریده دیست مرا - حل و حورا نداشت - رعایت نداشت - چون داده دیست

that on his way back from Hindūstān Mahmūd was reminded of the fate of poor Firdausī, whose work had not been duly appreciated and who had left the Imperial Court in utter disappointment, that Mahmūd asked one of his servants to remind him of it at Ghaznīn and he would do something for the poet, that on reaching Ghaznīn the Sultān was reminded of Firdausī, whereupon he sent indigo worth 60,000 dinars to the poet, and that the indigo was taken to him from one gate of the city while his corpse was being taken to the graveyard from another * Obviously this episode relates to the time of Firdausī's death, which took place in 411 A. H. One may therefore say that in the year 411 A. H. Mahmūd was coming back from Hindūstān. But there is nothing to corroborate this and we know for certain that Mahmūd undertook no expedition against India in the year 411 A. H. In the same story Nīzāmī al-'Arūzī says that he visited the Tomb of Firdausī in 510 A. H., but does not say that he was told anything about the story †. According to his own statement, he visited Nishāpur in 540 A. H., i.e., thirty years after visiting Firdausī's Tomb, and received details of it from Amīr Ma'zī ‡. This is incredible, for if the story had been correct or current in those days, the Mujāwar (man in charge) of Firdausī's Tomb must have known it and told it to al-'Arūzī, as is the usual practice. Evidently the story was fabricated later on.

* C. M., 81-82

† Ibid., p. 82

‡ Ibid., p. 81

Thirdly it is a question whether the Shāhnāmāh was undertaken by Firdausī at the instance of Sultan Mahmūd. According to Firdausī, the Shāhnāmāh was completed in 400 A H (=1010 A C) and it took him 30 or 35 years to complete it *. From this we infer that the work was started in (400—30=) 370 A H (=980 A C) or (400—35=) 365 A H. (=975 A C), i.e., it was started (388—370=) 18 years or (388—365=) 23 years before Mahmūd's accession, which took place in 388 A H. The conclusion therefore is that Firdausī was not appointed by Mahmūd for writing the Shāhnāmāh. This conclusion is confirmed by other considerations also. Mahmūd's reign extended over 33 years and the composition of the Shāhnāmāh took 35 years. Therefore, the work was started either 2 years before Mahmūd's accession

* The verses showing that the Shāhnāmāh was completed in 400 A H are -

وَهُرَتْ شَدَّةَ پَيْغَمْبَرَ - كَهْ گَفْتَمْ مِنْ اَيْنَ نَامَنْهَ شَهْرَ بَارَ

The verses showing that it was completed in 35 years are -

سَهْ سَالَ وَ پَيْغَمْبَرَ سَهْ سَلْعَحَ - چَدِیں رَبِعَ نَوْدَمَ نَمَ اَعْيَدَ گَلْعَحَ
چَوْ نَرَادَ دَادَدَ گَلْعَحَ مَرَا - سَهْ حَاصِلَهَ سَهْ وَ پَيْغَمْبَرَا

The verses showing that it was completed in 30 years are -

سَهْ رَبِعَ نَوْدَمَ دَرِیْسَ سَالَ سَهْ - عَصْمَ رَبِعَهَ کَوْدَمَ دَدِیْسَ فَارَسَتَ

or 2 years after his death. In one case it was not undertaken at Mahmūd's orders and in the other case it was not completed and presented to him during his lifetime. As the weight of evidence is in favour of the fact that the Shāhnāmeh was presented at the Court of Mahmūd, one cannot resist the alternate conclusion that it was undertaken by Firdausī on his own account and not at the request of Mahmūd. Assuming for the sake of argument that the Shāhnāmeh was written under Mahmūd's orders and assuming also that it was started from the very date of his accession (388 A. H.), it was then completed in (388+35=) 423 A. H. This would mean that it was completed (423—420=) 3 years after Mahmūd's death and (423—411=) 12 years or (423—417=) 6 years after Firdausī's death, 411 A. H. and 417 A. H. being the two dates of his death mentioned in the Shāhnāmeh. This also is impossible. Again, there is a verse in the Shāhnāmeh which means that the author, after completing the work, kept it with him for 20 years in order to find a suitable patron for it.* Adding this period of 20 years to that of 35 years, during which the work was completed, and subtracting the whole (20+35=55) from 400, the year when it was completed, we get (400—55=) 345 A. H. as the date of commencing it. In other words, the book was started (388—345=) 43 years before Mahmūd's accession.

* The verse referred to above is —

سخن را نگه داشتم سال دیست. - که بیدم سرا وار این گنج کیست

or (361—345 =) 16 years before his birth, the years 388 A H and 361 A H being his dates of accession and birth respectively. If we accept the period spent in the writing of the Shāhnāmah as 30 years, then according to the above calculations, it was started 38 years before Mahmūd's accession and 11 years before his birth. This too is absurd. And, if 389 A H * is accepted as the correct date of completion of the Shāhnāmah, then according to the above calculations, it was started in (389—50 =) 339 A H, i.e. (388—339 =) 49 years before Mahmūd's accession (388) or (361—339 =) 22 years before his birth. Here the period of completion of the Shāhnāmah is taken to be 30 years. If it is taken to be 35 years, then according to the above calculations, the writing of the Shāhnāmah was undertaken 43 years before Mahmūd's accession and 17 years before his birth. This is no less absurd. Other dates of completion of the book are 371, 384, 391 A H and the periods during which it was completed are 6, 13, 15 and 25. The results will be more discouraging if the date of starting the Shāhnāmah is worked out on their basis according to the above calculations. Furthermore, Firdausī says that his age was about 80 in the year 400 A. H †. That is to say, he was born in (400—

* This is according to the verse —

آمد ای سب - یم سال و چشتاد ناسی مدادست اگر سال

† At the end of the Shāhnāmah, which was completed in 400 A H, Firdausī says —

کنوں عمر دردیں پشتاد شد - امیدم یک نار نہاد شد

form of a book called *Pāstan-Nāmah by an intimate friend of his, named Muhammad Lashkari. Again, while Firdausi was writing the Shāhnāma, he enjoyed the patronage of Abū Mansūr, Hussain bin Qatīb and Arslān Khān, the governors of Tūs. Why should he receive the patronage of these persons when he had already found a patron in Mahmūd? It is quite obvious that he had not yet seen Mahmūd what to say of his appointment by him for writing the book. Furthermore, the first edition of the book is said to have been completed in 389 A.H. and dedicated to a certain notable of Khālanjān (in Isfahān), named Ahmad bin Muhammad bin Abī Bakr al-Isfahāni †. If the Shāhnāma had been written at the request of Sultan Mahmūd, it would not have been dedicated to Ahmad in 389 A.H. before its presentation to Mahmūd. Firdausi is stated to have visited Mahmūd's Court

* The relevant verses are

دہ شہر م دکے صہیں دوست ہوں - تو گفتی کہ نام دہیک پوسٹ دوں
مہرا گوت حرب احمد ایں رائے تو - نہ بیکی حرامد ۴۰ پائے تو
بوشتم میں ایں داہنہ پہلوی - نہ پلش تو آرم عالم معنوی
تو ایں قصر حصروں نار کو - ندیں دو سے رو جہماں آزو
چوں آورداں نامہ دردیکھیں - نہ ابروحث ایں حال تاریک من ۷ II F, 67, LHP, II, 133 † The relevant verses are — گہ ایا یہ احمد کہ ہم سال او - نعوید در حا اڑو آل او
رنا ایش حوثی تو نام درست - اب و دکو آخر محمد نخست
حداوہ د ایں دفتر نده کو د - لس غر مزادم پیار حدودہ اور
کہ مددوی طوی پاک حفظ - دہ ایں نامہ در نام مہمود گھب

at the age of 85, i.e., just before his death, then who worked at the Shāhnāmāh for 30 or 35 years, if we suppose that it was undertaken at the instance of Mahmūd, and how could it be presented at the Ghaznawid Court during the lifetime of Mahmūd? Obviously there was no question of appointment and hence no question of promise perfidy and repentance. Finally, the author of the Chahār Maqāla, which is the first source of information, does not say that Mahmūd had appointed Firdausī for writing the Shāhnāmāh. Later writers, who have made further embellishments on the story, have made this addition without citing any authority and hence cannot be believed to have told the truth. When the Shāhnāmāh was presented to Mahmūd, he is said to have asked his courtiers what reward he should give to its author.* If Mahmūd had appointed Firdausī to do that work and made a promise regarding his remuneration, he would not have put such a question to his courtiers. Moreover, Firdausī never referred to his appointment by Mahmūd for writing the Shāhnāmāh or to Mahmūd's promise and perfidy when he explained his case to the ruler of Tabaristān and Amīr Abul Muzaffar Nasr, the brother of Sultān Mahmūd. Finally, the task of writing the Shāhnāmāh was first undertaken by Daqīqī who is said to have composed as many as 1,000 verses before he left the task.† If this is correct, the story of Firdausī's appointment and Mahmūd's promise and perfidy falls to the ground

* C.M., 79

† T.F., 1, 39

Fourthly, the Shāhnāmeh has suffered a great deal and undergone many changes since it was completed * In the first place the authorship of the whole of the Shāhnāmeh, as it has come down to us, cannot be attributed to Firdausī alone, for two other poets of distinction have contributed a goodly number of verses to it According to the Tashara-i-Haft Aqlim and the Majma-ul-Fusaha, it contains 1,000 verses of Daqīqī†—a fact which Firdausī frankly admits and acknowledges the contribution with thanks ‡ According to Ferishta, the Shāhnāmeh was completed by Asadi Tusi who contributed 4,000 verses § The Atishkada-i-Asar also corroborates the above version in all details ¶ Professor Browne says that it was the second edition of the Shāhnāmeh which was presented at the Court of Mahmūd || This is quite consistent with the testimony adduced above If this is correct, the story of Mahmūd's appointment of Firdausī, promise of

* M F , 45 ff

† Ferishta also supports this (See T F , i, 62)

‡ The verses embodying this fact are —

رگسته سپ و از حاصل بینه هزار - نعمت و سو آمد و را رورگار
بیرون دم و درشتمن رو - ماس - مرا در دل آمد و هر سو هراس

§ T F , i, 61

¶ L H P , ii, 141

|| M F , 44 ff, and 65 ff

a dīnār for each verse and perfidy loses all force of reality and takes the form of fiction. Secondly, Firdausī's mastery of the Persian language was universally acknowledged and he always expressed himself in Persian without invoking the aid of the Arabic language, and hence the most important and distinctive feature of the Shāhnāmāh was the absence of Arabic words. But the existing MSS. of the book are free from this convention, for they contain a number of Arabic words and phrases. At present there are many MSS. of the Shāhnāmāh and, though the book is universally believed to contain 60,000 verses, no two of the existing MSS. contain the same number of verses. That written by Muhammad Khān Qazwīnī contains 42,000 verses, others have more than this and the one written in 810 A H., i.e. 410 years after the completion of the book and is perhaps the oldest of all that have survived, contains as many as 87,911 verses, of which 7,000 are in praise of Baghdād. Why so many verses in praise of Baghdād and not Ghaznīn is an objection which, like many others, need not be dilated upon here. Suffice it to say here that the presence of so many MSS., containing different number of verses and different accounts, renders the authenticity as well as authorship of the book highly apocryphal. Again there are many historical mistakes in the Shāhnāmāh as it has come down to us, e.g., Parīchehra is spoken of as the grand-daughter of Iraj, whereas in fact she was his daughter, the murderers of Dārā are stated to have been two Wazīrs, named Nasar and Halosar, though in fact they were two soldiers of Hamadān*. There are a large number of discrepancies and even contradictions in all the existing MSS of the book † Furthermore, there are serious literary and poetical defects which cannot escape the notice of anyone conversant with Persian language and literature ‡ These are defects and drawbacks which cannot be attributed to such a competent poet and well-informed scholar as Firdausī. Such, in short, is the extent of changes which the Shahnamah has undergone that Allāma Lutf 'Alī Azār has good grounds to doubt if it still retains any verses of Firdausī at all. Under the circumstances, it is not safe to hold him responsible for the whole book as we have it or to say that it was written by him at the instance and under the patronage of Sultān Mahmūd § And, whatever the merits and

* Vide M. I., 50

† Ibid., pp. 56 ff.

‡ Ibid., pp. 51-53

§ It appears to me that the story of the famous Arabian poet, called Lubaid 'Amrī, and 'Imrī Muāwiya was moulded into that of 'Mahmud and Firdausī' by some ingenious writer, with necessary changes, and fathered on Nizāmi al-Arūzī. Khalīfa 'Umar had granted a monthly allowance of 300 dirhams to Lubaid 'Amrī for his poetic talents. This monthly allowance was increased by 100 dirhams by the succeeding Khalīfas, 'Usmān and 'Alī. When Muāwiya became Khalīfa, he diminished the allowance, which the poet refused to accept. Later, the Khalīfa repented of his act, increased the allowance and sent the arrears to the poet. It is stated that the money reached the place of the poet, when his dead body was short-comings of the present Shahnāmah, there is no doubt that it is a book of poetry and cannot therefore be free from exaggeration, and we cannot arrive at correct conclusions as long as due allowance is not made for this element. If Mahmūd did not live up to his words on account of his miserliness, as alleged, why did he repent and send the promised amount with other presents to the poet after he had left the Imperial Court and composed a most trenchant satire on the Sultan? The satire would have enraged the Sultan and furnished a casus belli for wreaking a vengeance on him. Far from repenting and rewarding him, Mahmūd must have hunted him down and impaled him without compassion if he had in fact written that satire.

Let us now turn to the satire and see if it
The Satire was really written by Firdausī. As apart from the cumulative evidence adduced above, there are other considerations that confirm our doubts, so much so that we cannot attribute its authorship to that poet. We learn from the Chahār Maqāla, which is the only source drawn upon by later writers about the legend of 'Mahmūd and Firdausī' and the 'satire' that originally the satire consisted of 100 verses and that all of them, except six, were destroyed by the King of Tabaristān with his being carried to the graveyard. The deceased had a daughter, to whom the amount was given, but she refused to accept it (See translator's note in I K, II, xii, 268-69)

have put a crown on my head, and if his mother had been a Bānū (lady of noble birth) he would have covered me with gold and silver up to my knees' * Now who does not know that Mahmūd was the son of Amīr Subuktigīn from his wife who was the daughter of no less a person than an Amīr of Zābulistān? Is it not a historical blunder or rather the height of absurdity to say that he was not the son of a king and a queen? Going further, the above statement is thus contradicted "The son of a concubine will do no good even if he be the son of a king" Here Mahmūd is spoken of as the son of a concubine, which is too foolish a remark to comment upon, and is also admitted as the son of a Shahryār (king) as against the previous statement in which he is not † The satire also contains verses in praise of the Sultān, which shows that it was not the work of one man It also contains a number of Arabic words, which is quite contrary to the practice of Firdausī who always used strictly Persian words and expressions There are also in the satire idioms and expressions which were not in vogue in his times Finally, the language and the style of the satire are far inferior to those employed by him in his Shāhnāmeh Evidently the satire, fathered on Firdausī, is not his work If he had

* The verses translated here are —

اگر شاه را شاه دودے پدر - سرم نو بیادے مرا تاج ۱۱
وگر مادر شاه نانو ندے - مرا سیم وررتا نه را بود

† The verse translated here is —

بُستار، ۱۱ آید نکار - اگرچه بود، راده شیریار

in fact been the author of it, he would not have written verses at the mosque in praise of the Sultan and about his own bad buck.*

The sum and substance of the above discussion is that both the story and the satire are false and frivolous, concocted with no other intention than to create an aversion against one of the greatest personalities of the world. Those who charge Mahmūd of avarice and greed forget his munificence which was so widely and liberally enjoyed. The theory of niggardliness, based on the fantastically absurd legend of 'Firdausī and Mahmūd' is fully negatived by the fact that he spent huge sums of money on the construction of public works. If he knew how to collect wealth, he also knew how to spend it. Those who say that Firdausī was a Shī'a and it was for this reason that Mahmūd deprived him of 'the promised reward' should know that Mahmūd's patronage was enjoyed by all and sundry, irrespective of race or religion, that a king who appreciated merits from whatever source they emanated and rewarded them with

* The verses referred to above are —

حَسَنَهُ دَرْكَهُ مُحَمَّدُ رَأَى دَرِيَا سَتَ
چَنْوَهُ دَرِيَا كَهُ اُورَا سَارَا پَيدَا وَيَسَتَ
رَعْطَهُ لَهُ رَدَمَ وَادَدَرَ او دَدِيدَمَ دَرَ
گَلَاهُ دَيَتَ مَنَ اسَبَ اَيَنَ گَلَاهُ دَرِيَا وَيَسَتَ

Note that in these verses Mahmūd is referred to as 'Mahmūd-i-Zābulī, because his mother was the daughter of an Amir of Zābulistān.

cavil cannot be said to have deprived Firdausī of his due on that score, and that the Sultān was quite favourably inclined towards the Shīas and had given two daughters of his in marriage to two Shīa' Princes named Mīnūchihr bin Qābūs and 'Unsar-ul-Ma'ālī Kāikāūs*. The mere mole out of which a huge mountain has been made is that Firdausī was charged with "Carmathian heresy" and imprisoned at the instigation of hostile courtiers who bore him bitter jealousy. At a time when there existed a bitter enmity between the Sultān and the Carmathians, when most of the leaders of the Carmathians were the residents of Tūs, the native place of Firdausī, when Firdausī was found to have connections with the Dailamites, who had given protection to the Carmathians and when he had received a rich reward from Fakhr-ud-Daulah, the Dailamite, it was not difficult to substantiate the charge—a charge on which many had lost their lives. When released at the request of friendly court-poets, Firdausī went to Mahīnūd's brother for a recommendation, explained his position to him and said that he had suffered through the machinations of a jealous courtier who had instigated the Sultān against him before the latter had cast a glance at the contents of the book †.

* MF, 36 ff, MG, 152

† This is evident from the following verses of the Shāhnāmāh—

چلیں شہر یارے کہ دشمنو - نہ گئتی ر شاہان در حشد
نہ کرد اور اس داستار پر نگاہ - دد گوئے در بحث آمد گواہ

Why did Firdausī go to Mahmūd's brother for a recommendation when he had left the Court in disgust and composed such a satire as has come down to us? If he had composed the satire, how could he come back safely from a person none other than Sultān's own brother? Obviously, there was no question of appointment and reward for writing the *Shāhnāmah.

The story that can be reconstructed after reshuffling the conflicting and contradictory mass of evidence that has come down to us is that Firdausī wrote a major portion of the Shāhnāmah at his own sweet will and was in search of a patron, that with the help of the Governor of Tūs he had access to the Court of Mahmūd, that there he would have made a fortune if he had not fallen a victim to the jealousy of hostile courtiers, that he was charged with 'Carmathian

حسد دود دد گوئے در طار میں - تھے شد نہ شاہ نار آر میں
ند اندیش را روئے بیکی صناد - سندھاںے نیکم نہ نہ کرد یاد

Al-'Arūzī, the author of the Chahār Maqāla, who is responsible for the story of Firdausī, thus writes at one place "نطم او (فردوسی) اکر سلطان محمود داسنہ بودے ہوا کا کہ آن آزاد میر دا معروف دمایوس نداش" (C M , 55)—

Evidently al-Arūzī does not charge Mahmūd of avarice

* Dr M Nāzim is wrong in saying that "Firdausī composed a large portion of his immortal Shāhnāmah at his (Mahmūd's) Court, and probably at his request, but his work did not receive proper recognition" (M G , 158) Vide Supra, pp 130 ff

heresy' and imprisoned, that on his release he sought the recommendation of Mahmūd's brother but failed in his object and died in disappointment in his home at Tūs, and that he left the Shahnamah incomplete, which was completed by 'Asadī

While we are still about the story and the Charge of satire, it is necessary to make a short bastardy reference to the charge of 'bastardy' laid against Sultān Mahmūd. But for the fact that European scholars are too apt to accept all that is against the Muslim Kings as correct and reject all that is in their favour as fiction founded on flattery and that the rigours of their criticism are one-sided, confined only to the bright side of the picture, stories and satires such as we have dealt with would have vanished instead of gaining such a wide currency. Accepting the story and the satire at their face value without subjecting them to a critical examination, they have not only charged Mahmūd of stinginess but have also challenged his legitimacy by declaring him a bastard.* In his account of Sultān Mahmūd, Sir W Haig tries to exonerate the Sultan of the blame of bastardy and defends him at the cost of Islām by saying that "he (Mahmūd) seems to have been the son of a concubine" and arguing that "by the law of Islām the son of a concubine or handmaiden is as legitimate as the son of a regularly married wife"† Here the learned writer betrays a superficial knowledge of the laws of Islām and Muslim history and an utter lack of critical perception. In the first place, Mahmūd was not the son of a concubine, but of a mother who was the daughter of an Amir of Zābulistān, regularly married to his father,* and secondly, according to the laws of Islām, the son of a concubine cannot be "as legitimate as the son of a regularly married wife," as our mis-informed friend would have us believe.†

* Brigg's Ferishta, I, 29, foot-note.

† C H I , III, 27

* I have used the words "regularly married" because there is no evidence to the contrary. There is no evidence to the contrary because there was nothing uncommon about the marriage of Mahmūd's mother. Had there been anything unusual about it, it must have been made much of by the enemies of the Sultān. My conclusion is also confirmed by the fact that Mahmūd was known as 'Mahmūd-i-Zabulī' after his mother who was the daughter of an Amir of Zābulistān, and if there had been any slur about her marriage his court-poets would never have called him 'Mahmūd-i-Zabulī.'

† Concubinage means sexual connection with a woman not holding the legal status of a wife or keeping a woman in the capacity of a wife without contracting Nikāh (regular marriage) with her. The practice was common in pre-Islamic Arabia and might have also been in vogue among some Muslims before the revelation of the verse making the marriage of male as well as female slaves compulsory. No master of a slave girl could keep her as a concubine without violating the injunction embodied in the said verse. In the Holy Book 'ownership' is not recognized as validating or legalizing sexual intercourse. The only thing that legalizes sexual relationship is marriage duly performed. The conditions governing the marriage of a slave girl are the same as those applicable in the case of a free

Another equally fantastic and absurd story is that relating to Mahmūd and Ayāz Mahmūd and Ayāz This story has latterly provided a most popular theme for literary compositions in prose as well as poetry It is said that Ayāz was a most handsome youth and hence an object of Mahmūd's passionate love and veneration Briefly stated, the story is as follows
"The love which Sultān Mahmūd cherished for Ayāz exceeded all limits, but there was no tinge of sensuality in it * One day, when wine was being served in a banquet, Mahmūd drank beyond sobriety and lost his consciousness In that state of drunkenness his eyes fell on Ayāz's interwoven curly locks, hanging down on his face, and, losing control over himself, he threw his arms round the boy's neck, but soon woke up and, in his zeal for piety, ordered Ayāz to cut down his locks and his orders were at once obeyed by woman, with the addition that the consent of the master, in addition to that of the girl, must be obtained Sexual intercourse with a slave-girl is lawful only when a regular Nikāh is contracted with her Thus the son of a concubine cannot be "as legitimate as that of a regularly married wife", as our misinformed friend would have us believe (See Al-Qur-ān, xxiv, 32)

* Dr M Nāzim has apparently accepted the story as true but characterized Mahmūd's love for Ayāz as true and based on the latter's "extraordinary devotion" and not on "his good looks" Here he has not used that critical acumen which he has so prominently displayed in other parts of his learned monograph on Mahmūd He seems to have followed Allāma Shībī and his followers (See M G, 153)

the boy **

The Chahār Maqāla is the oldest work in prose in which the story appears, and it is most probably from this solitary source that it has been reproduced by later historians and modern writers. Nothing needs now be said about the merits of the book whose authenticity has been successfully challenged by competent scholars and whose defects have been exposed in the preceding pages †. Reading through the story, one cannot help being struck with the following points, viz., (1) that Mahmūd was a drunkard whose parties were characterized by wine-drinking, (2) that he lost control over himself at the sight of Ayāz and fell a prey to carnal love inclining towards unnatural gratification of sexual appetite, and (3) that he gained control over himself in that state of drunkenness and, moved by piety, ordered Ayāz to cut down his locks as if they were responsible for the episode. In order to see how far the story is correct, it is necessary to examine these three points, two of which amount to very serious charges against Mahmūd's moral character and the third is a ridicu-

* This is a quotation from Allāma Shīblī's Shir-ul-'Ajām. I have reproduced the story in his words in order to show how the story has escaped critical examination and hence misled scholars of established repute.

† C. M., 61-64. The story also finds place in the Kulliyāt-i-Attār, but being written about a century after the Chahār Maqāla, it is reasonable to suppose that it has borrowed it from the same source, i.e., Chahār Maqāla.

‡ See supra, pp 132 ff

lous contradiction of facts. The first is a charge of drunkenness, which must be dismissed as false in the presence of more reliable and weighty evidence pointing to Mahmūd's piety *. It is almost universally admitted that Mahmūd was a most pious man who kept company with men of piety and learning and never indulged in mean pleasures prohibited by the Shariyat (Islamic law). Once it is admitted that Mahmūd was a pious man and a staunch follower of his faith, it would be impossible to imagine that he was a habitual drunkard, as depicted in the story. The correctness of the second charge, which is a most heinous one, depends upon the correctness of the first charge. If the first charge falls, the second cannot stand. In the case of a drunkard and in a state of drunkenness, the animal in the man may come out and appear in all its nakedness, but a man who never indulged in licentious debauchery—a man whose piety is admitted even by his hostile critics—cannot be accused of leaning to that weakness. Psychologically, subconscious qualities come into play in a state of drunkenness and the habits formed, good or bad, appear on the surface and cannot be concealed. But we have ample testimony about Mahmūd's character and habits, and in the presence of such strong evidence in his favour he cannot be said to have acted in the manner described in the story. The most funny thing in the story is that its author, as also those who have followed him, speak highly of Mahmūd's piety and at the same time accuse him of drunkenness and showing an inclination towards sodomy. How piety and drunkenness could go hand in hand in the case of Mahmūd is not explained. This in itself is enough to discredit the story and prove its falsity. The third is an amplification of this contradiction of facts. It is a mixture of opposites—piety and impiety, drunkenness and sobriety*. How a man whose piety is admitted on all hands, even by the author of the story, could become impious at one and the same time, how in a state of drunkenness he could remain pious and how in his passion for piety he would like to punish the object of his true love instead of reproaching and reforming himself are points which contradict each other and conclusively prove that the story is nothing but a fabrication and that its author was nothing but a fool. For, in the first place, it is impossible to remain pious when drunk and secondly it was not just or equitable on the part of Mahmūd, whose sense of justice is also universally admired, to order the cutting of Ayāz's locks which had done no wrong. If there was anything wrong, should the story be true, it was Mahmūd and not Ayāz who was responsible for it. In that case, Mahmūd should have given up drinking, "the mother of all evils", if at all he had been a drunkard, as depicted in the story, or he should have reproached and reformed himself. That would have been the proper course under those circumstances. That Mahmūd liked and even loved Ayāz is true enough, but the story as told in the Chahār Maqāla and reproduced in the Shur-ul-'Ajām and other books, is false on the face of it. Dr M Nāzīm is right in saying that "the proverbial attachment of the Sultān to his handsome Turkoman slave Abū'n-Najm Ayāz bin Uymaq was due to the extraordinary devotion of Ayāz rather than to his good looks" It appears that the existence of this attachment captured the fancy of poets and story-tellers who developed it into a love-romance and depicted it in lurid colours.

* Vide infra, 166 ff

* How the author of the story, who was a Muslim, and his Muslim imitators, including 'Allāma Shīblī, were able to reconcile these opposites is not clear to me and I am at a loss to understand their conception of "piety" and "true love" (See C II, 62)

The Idol of Somnāth Another story that lacks historical foundation is that relating to the Idol of Somnāth. Briefly stated, it is to the effect that after the conquest of Somnāth Mahmūd entered the temple and ordered the idol to be demolished, that in spite of the strong protestations and remonstrances of the Brahmans, who threw themselves at the feet of the invader and rolled before him, imploring to spare the idol and take its weight in gold, the Sultān lifted up his mace and dealt it a heavy blow, saying that he would rather like to be called an idol-breaker than an idol-seller, and that the moment the blow escaped the hollow figure burst inunder and poured forth a far larger treasure at the feet of the 'iconoclast' than was offered to him for sparing it. This story is notorious for the following reasons—(1) It lacks all contemporaneity confirmation. If it had been true and correct, it would have been utilized as a theme for gassas by such poets as Farrukhi. (2) The unexpected find of gems and jewels is not mentioned in any of the contemporary works, nor does it find place in the letter of victory sent by the Sultan to the Khalifa of Baghdad and quoted by the earlier authorities. (3) There ought to have been no question of offering a ransom for sparing the idol for the simple reason that everything belonged to Mahmud by right of conquest and lay at his mercy. (4) The lingams or phalli everywhere in India are invariably made of solid stone and are not hollow, and there is no reason why the lingam at Somnāth be made an exception to the rule. (5) As the form and shape of the lingam of Somnāth are not described by any writer, it is reasonable to believe that it was a shapeless solid stone and not hollow. (6) The contemporary scholar, Alberuni, who had travelled all over India and recorded his observations on Hindū life and thought, has given elaborate rules regarding the construction of such idols (lingams).^{*} He has nowhere mentioned that the lingams were hollow. On the other hand, the impression that we gather from his account is that they were solid. In view of all these facts it is not safe to believe the story that Mahmūd was requested to spare the idol of Somnāth and take its weight in gold and that he refused to do so on the ground that he preferred the title of idol-breaker to that of idol-seller. It must therefore be dismissed as a later concoction. That the idol was broken is true enough.

* See Sīchru, II, 193-4.

This story is as follows. Mahmūd was so much fascinated by the climate of Kāthiāwar that he wished to fix his capital there, but was dissuaded by his officers from doing so and advised to leave a deputy there. There were two candidates for the post of governor—one an ascetic and the other a Rāja—either called Dābishlīm. The choice of the Sultān fell on the ascetic and he was appointed governor of the place. Lest Rāja Dābishlīm should menace the ascetic Dābishlīm after the departure of Mahmūd, he requested the Sultān to remove him from his way. At that time the Sultān said that he had already spent a period of three years in carrying on 'a holy war' in India and that he would have to stay there for another six months to settle that affair. Rāja Dābishlīm was attacked, defeated and brought a prisoner before the new governor, but he feared to keep him in his own custody and therefore requested the Sultan to take him with himself. Mahmūd acceded to his request and took the captive to Ghaznī. Subsequently, the governor sent his men to fetch over his rival to his capital.

Story of 2
Dābishlīms

When the captive was due, the governor went a part of the way to receive him in accordance with the custom of the country. As the captive was a little late in arriving, he went to sleep under the shade of a tree, putting a red handkerchief on his face. While he was fast asleep, a bird of prey stooped down and, mistaking the red handkerchief for a piece of flesh, pounced upon his face and tore away his eyes along with the handkerchief. When the captive arrived, the people acclaimed him as their ruler, for their ruler (the ascetic) had been rendered unfit to rule. The new ruler, i.e., Raja Dabishlim, ascended the throne and confined his rival, the ascetic, in the cell which the latter had prepared for him.⁺

This is a myth on the face of it. In the first place, it lacks all contemporary confirmation. There is nothing in the contemporary literature to corroborate any of the statements made above. It first appears in the Wasaya-i-Nizam-ul Mulk which is a work of the 9th century, written about four centuries after the death of Mahmud. Secondly, there is nothing on record to show that Mahmud ever fought against a Raja, named Dabishlim, whom he carried to Ghazni as a prisoner, etc.[†] Thirdly, we know for certain that

* T. F., 1, 34-35, Rauzat us Safa, 741-42.

† In vain have some modern scholars devoted their time and energy to the identification of the mythical Dabishlims with some Hindu princes of India. Professor Hodivala has devoted considerable space to the subject, but has not been able to resist the conclusion that the story is a myth.

he left no governor at Somnāth * On the other hand, the Hindū governor of the place, who had fled at the approach of Mahmūd, returned soon after his departure † Fourthly, Mahmūd's stay at Somnāth did not exceed a few days Allāma Ibn-ul-Asīr informs us that Mahmūd went back to Ghaznīn within four months after the capture of Somnāth ‡ During the years preceding and following the year of the Somnāth expedition Mahmūd was occupied elsewhere §

pure and simple In his own words "The story is undoubtedly unhistorical and the details imaginary The chronology also is impossible, as Mahmūd is known to have returned to Ghaznīn in 417 H The name of Dābīshlīm is only a literary fiction or reminiscence from the Kalila-wa-Dimna and the denouement is merely an edifying tale of poetic justice, an epilogue to inculcate and point a moral of the 'Bitter bit' type " (S I - II H , 239)

* See supra, pp 75 ff , and M G , 118, f n 8

† Z A , 86

‡ K T , 11, 242-43

§ See supra, pp 35-36, 46 48

CHAPTER VII

SULTAN MAHMUD THE GREAT—VI

CLOSING DAYS, CHARACTER AND ESTIMATE

Now that we have dealt with the wars and conquests of Sultan Mahmud, the Introductory cultural activities of his reign and the stories delineating certain traits of his character, it has become easy for us to describe his character, to estimate the value of his work and to assign him his proper place in history. But before this is done, it is necessary to give a brief account of his closing days because they too have a bearing on the subject under discussion.

During the expedition against the Jats (1027 A.C.) Mahmud is said to His illness have contracted malaria, which became chronic and affected his lungs and death. He continued suffering from consumption for over two years. During his illness also he did not allow himself the rest that was so essential for his health. On the other hand, he concealed his ill-health from the public and exposed himself to the hardships of arduous journeys and distant expeditions. He performed his daily duties as before and did not shrink from proceeding against the Saljuqs and the refractory governors in person even when he was suffering from that malady. The result was that his health, rapidly failing, broke down, so much so that he sank all of a sudden and passed away on the 30th of April, 1030 A C* He was buried in the Firozi Garden which was his most favourite pleasure-resort † During his prolonged illness he showed remarkable powers of endurance and self-control His end was indeed in harmony with his eventful career—a monument of patience and perseverance, self-reliance and contempt of danger He died quite as boldly as he had lived—defying death ‡

On his death-bed the Sultan is said to have ordered his treasures to be displayed before him and to have 'wept bitterly' at their sight His grief on that occasion is differently interpreted by different writers: One theory is that he felt pangs of remorse at the prospect of leaving behind his treasures of wealth without having spent anything in the way of God § The sponsors of this theory charge him with "a sordid love of mammon" and condemn

Review of riches and expression of sorrow

* According to lunar reckoning Mahmud had an age of sixty-one years

† T M, 12

‡ Z A, 92, and K T, iv, 281

§ The first propounder of this view seems to have been Khwāndmīr He is followed, among others, by Sir W Haig who says "The avarice most conspicuously displayed in his review of his riches before his death and in his undignified lamentations over the prospect of leaving them " (C H I, iii, 27)

shock at the presentiment that the empire that had entailed so much suffering and bloodshed was tottering to its fall before his own eyes "On the distant horizon", says Dr M Nazim, "his keen eye could discern a dark cloud, the harbinger of a threatening storm for the Seljūqs, whom in a moment of weakness he had permitted to settle in Khurāsān, were gathering force with ominous rapidity The stupendous achievement of a life of vigorous warfare appeared to be crumbling away as the great Sultān lay on his death-bed"*

There is no doubt that Mahmūd had succeeded in creating a vast and wonderful empire out of chaos within a period of thirty years—an achievement which reflects great credit on his military genius—, but it is open to doubt if he had taken necessary steps to consolidate what he had conquered and to cement the foundations of his empire His work did not endure The mighty fabric fell down soon after his death It appears that it had some inherent weaknesses and that it carried the germs of disintegration with it ✓In the first place, consolidation in the scheme of the Sultān did not keep pace with conquest Most of his time was occupied by wars and conquests Consequently, he had little leisure to devote to administrative affairs The story of the widow who complained of lawlessness in the distant parts of the Ghaznawīd Empire and Mahmūd's

* M G, 125

prompt action does reflect credit on the Sultān's sense of duty towards his subjects, but it does not conceal the fact that the administrative control was rather slack * Secondly, the Empire had grown unwieldy and in the absence of such means of communication and transportation as we have in our own times it was not easy to inspire awe and fear among the refractory governors of the outlying provinces of the far-flung empire, who never missed an opportunity or failed to avail themselves of the weakness of the Central Government Thirdly, when the Sultān was out on his expeditions the work of administration was carried on by his ministers There is no doubt that his ministers were men of great ability and character, but it cannot be denied that they were wanting in the breadth of vision and betrayed a certain amount of selfishness They devised no means and methods for controlling the distant parts of the Empire and establishing the Imperial authority there On the other hand, they seem to have done more to strengthen the Vizārat Department than to cement the foundations of the great Empire † Fourthly, the government of the newly conquered provinces was not based on the acquiescent good-will of

* On receipt of her complaint when the Sultān urged the impossibility of maintaining law and order in such remote parts of his Empire as Irāq, the widow boldly retorted "Why do you conquer places which you cannot properly govern? You shall have to account for this on the Day of Judgment' (S N , 58)

† See S A M A , 161, ff

the people living there Kingdoms were overthrown and princes were taken prisoners, but no attempt was made to pacify the people Temporarily subdued, the supporters and sympathizers of the fallen stars were ever ready to cast in their lot with the enemies of the Sultān with a view to throw off his yoke Fifthly, the wealth that had poured in from all quarters fostered luxury among the Ghaznawids and demoralized them The rise, at first, of the Saljūqs and then of the Ghūrīds, who were heads and shoulders above the degenerated Ghaznawids in physical strength and stamina, sounded the death-knell of the Ghaznawīd Empire, which could not withstand or survive the repeated rebuffs inflicted on it by its enemies Finally, the successors of Sultān Mahmūd were mere mediocres, who could not control the affairs of such a vast and wonderful Empire Some of them were too weak to suppress disorders even in their capital. The dismemberment of the Empire began as soon as the master-mind was no more The disruptive elements kept under control by Mahmūd escaped soon after his death and plunged the administrative affairs into chaos *

The character and work of Sultān Mahmūd, whose name has become the centre Mahmūd's character of a cycle of heroic legends, have occasioned a most heated controversy By some he is regarded as a fierce, ferocious and fanatical Muslim who knew no pity and who tried to plant Islam in India at the point of the sword. Others have depicted him in most lurid colours and tried to show that he was a brigand chief, with an insatiable thirst for power, self and prestige, 'so laboriously won, so precariously held, so inevitably lost' Dazzled by his extraordinary genius—too dazzled to know his limitations—, his ill-informed admirers have raised him above criticism and declared him not only the greatest sovereign the world has ever produced but also a saint, endowed with miraculous powers. Whereas fanatics of to-day have extolled him as a true model of kingship whose foot-steps every Muslim king should aspire to follow, moralists of a different type have condemned him as an embodiment of avarice, greed and selfishness. Such are the conflicting and contradictory views about his character and work, carried to their farthest extremes by their exponents. The truth lies between the two extremes, for Mahmud was neither the one nor the other—neither a saint nor a savage. As a man and a mortal, he had his own virtues and weaknesses; and there is no point in exaggerating the one or the other side of his character and thus overdrawing the picture.

* See infra, Chapters VIII and IX

A man of medium stature, with muscular and well-proportioned limbs, fine complexion, handsome face, small eyes and a fine round chin, covered His personal appearance with a sparse beard, Mahmud enjoyed a sound robust health which never failed him during his thirty years' struggle when he had to bear the hardships and privations of arduous journeys and prolonged sieges,* except at the end when he fell ill and spoiled it by strenuous work

Mahmūd was endowed with remarkable qualities of head and heart Kind His virtues and sympathetic by nature, he was a man of strong family affections He was a dutiful son and a loving brother As a lieutenant of his father, he proved himself a great source of strength to him in his military expeditions He always tried to act upon his advice The reasons why he acted against his will in the matter of succession to the throne have been set forth at their proper place and there is no need to recapitulate them here † Suffice it to private life and tried to regulate their social activities in accordance with the Islāmic code of morality. He trained them in the military exercises of the day, and in order to enable them to pick up the requisite administrative experience, he placed them in charge of provincial governments and appointed capable ministers to assist them in their work. He was very kind and considerate to his officers. He respected their legitimate aspirations and always tried to promote their interests. That was why he received glowing tributes from them even after his death. He threw careers open to talents and recognized ability, education and experience as the principal qualifications for the State service. Dr M Nāzim assures us that there is nothing on record to indicate that he ever chose his ministers for considerations other than those stated above.* He was very generous and forgiving and it was only in rare cases that he inflicted capital punishment. He seldom punished the rebels with anything worse than simple imprisonment. He had an innate love of justice and was profoundly interested in its even-handed distribution. His sense of justice is beautifully illustrated by the treatment meted out by him to his nephew for contracting illicit connections with the wife of a poor man† and

* This testimony of Allāma Ibn ul-Asīr (K T, 18, 284) and Sibt Ibn-ul-Jawzī (quoted by Dr M Nāzīm in M G, 151, f n 1) is enough to belie the story that Mahmūd had very ugly looks, which was a constant source of mortification to him (T G in E & D, iii, 245, H I, 246) Referring to the personal features of Mahmūd, Ḥamdullah Mastauft says صورت کجے (لکھو) ; e had an ugly appearance (T G, 395) The Siyāsat-Nāmah of Nizām-ul-Mulk is, as far as I know, the earliest source of the insinuation It is a work of the 5th century H (485 A H = 1092-93 A C) All that it says about Mahmūd's personal looks is — سلو بود و — ; e did not possess a handsome face (S N, 44) Ferishta says سلطان اور حسن و حمال طیزی عاری بود ; e The Sultan was devoid of outward (or physical) beauty and grace (T F, i, 22)

† See supra pp 26-29.

* M G, 151

† Once a poor man presented a complaint to the Sultān, alleging that his nephew, having struck intimacy with his wife, had entered his house by force, disgraced him and driven him out by dealing blows, and that the offender had the punishment inflicted by him on an important military officer named 'Alī Nushtigīn for transgressing the Muslim law * His own son, Mas'ūd, could escape to appear before a Qāzī only by an immediate settlement of the claim against him.† His respect for genuine piety is borne out by the visit he paid to the celebrated saint, Abul Hasan Kharqānī, after undertaking an arduous journey ‡ and the reception he used to accord to another saint, named Abū Saīd 'Abdul Malik bin Abū 'Usmān Muhammad bin Ibrāhīm al-Khargūshī, whenever he visited the Imperial Court § He was deeply interested in the welfare of his subjects Story-tellers and other writers have credited him with a strong sense of duty to his people and a very high conception of kingship renewed the outrage more than once The Sultān was exasperated at this piece of information and was beside himself with rage, but he asked the complainant to keep quiet and to come again and inform him as soon as the offender paid another visit On the third day the complainant appeared again and informed the Sultān of the wrong to which he was being constantly subjected Putting on a loose cloak and taking his sword with him, Mahmūd followed the complainant to his house and found the guilty couple in flagrante de licto He first extinguished the lamp and then dealt such a blow to the adulterer with his sword that his head fell off (T F , 1, 36)

* S N , 41

† Ibid , 208

‡ T F , 1, 37 38, and Taskarat-ul-Auliyā, Pt II, 209

§ K T , 1A, 247

It is narrated that on receiving a complaint from a widow about a dacoity in the vicinity of Irāq, in which her son was killed, he took effective measures for the maintenance of law and order even in the remotest parts of his far flung empire *

From being an orthodox follower of the Hanafite school of law, Mahmūd His religious beliefs & piety changed over to the Karramite creed, which attributed "substantiality" to God, and ultimately subscribed to the Shāfi'īte school of law † Despite these changes—indicating perhaps a spirit of independent inquiry in religious matters—, he had a strong faith in God and was so firm in faith that even amidst a clash of arms he would kneel down to offer his homage to the Almighty and pray for the success of his arms. Punctilious in the performance of his religious duties, he paid Zakāt and distributed alms among the poor and was highly extolled for his piety.‡ He is said to have been

* T H , i, 296 , and S N , 58

† T Y , 324-33, Mughis-ul-Khalq quoted in M G , 159 , and S N , 44

‡ T M , 330 , K T , ix, 262 , and M G , 159 Ferishta, a later historian, thus describes the character of Sultan Mahmūd the Great —

”سلطان مسعود عربوی پادشاه دودن انصاف سعادت دینی و دینوی فائز گردیده سیرت پسندیده بعائی رسا وید که از هم پادشاهان در گشته“ (تاریخ فرشته - حکایات - صفحات ۲۳-۲۲)

In the presence of such strong and sufficient keenly desirous of performing a pilgrimage to Mecca, but his political pre-occupations left him no time to do so * Far from fanatic, as he is too often described, he was not even a bigot, and if he was, he was one without intolerance. He maintained a large body of Hindus in his service and we know for certain that conversion was not a condition of their employment. He waged wars with the infidels not because it was meritorious from religious point of view—they had not the least semblance of Jihad (defensive war) in them—, but because it was a part of his military programme, a great source of gain and, withal, the greatest source of glory in his times †

As a soldier & a general He was the beau ideal of a soldier. He always fought in the front rank and his was always the inspiring soul in the battle-field. He is said to evidence, pointing to his piety, it is difficult to believe that he was addicted to drinking, as he is supposed to have been (M G, 153). He might have been addicted to drinking in his youth and then given it up later on and become pious. But for this there is nothing to reconcile the two contradictory traits of his character — حُلُمْ or piety and شُرَاب دُورِى or drunkenness

* M G, 160

† See supra, pp 84 ff, and H I, 292. There is but one solitary instance when Mahmud is said to have offered the alternatives of "Islam, tribute or the sword" to a Hindu Raja of Hindustan—Ganda, who stoutly rejected the first two proposals and cheerfully accepted the challenge to fight—but this does not mean that he compelled the Raja to embrace Islam, for the Raja had the option of retaining his religion on payment of tribute after submission have received as many as 72 cuts and wounds * His genius as a general cannot be described justly except in terms of superlatives that defy the dictionary His military exploits eclipsed those of Alexander the Great and stand unsurpassed in the annals of the world At his accession he was the ruler of Ghaznīn, Bust and Balkh, which he held as a vassal of the Sāmānid King Immediately after his accession he declared his independence and, like other independent rulers, established direct relations with the Khalifa of Baghdād Next he launched upon a career of conquest which was crowned with the creation of a vast and wonderful empire He conquered Sīstān, Ghūr, Gharshistān, Khwārizm, Kāfiristān, Rāiy, Jibāl, and Isfahān, and established his suzerainty over the rulers of Qusdār, Mekrān, Tabaristān, Jurjān, Khultān, Saghāniyān and Qubādiyān in the west In the east he overran a large part of India, overthrew the Hindūshāhiya Dynasty which ruled over the region between Lamghān and the river Biyās, conquered Multān and Bhātiya and exacted allegiance from the rulers of the states of southern Kashmīr, Kanauj, Kālinjar, Gwalior, Narāyanpur and many other Rājas of secondary importance Within a period of three decades he set up an empire which extended from Irāq and the Caspian Sea to the Ganges and from the Aral Sea and Transoxiana to the Indian Ocean, Sind and the desert of Rājpūtāna, covering an area of about 2,800,000

* Majmā-ul-Ansāb quoted in M G , 154

square miles *

As a king So much of Mahmūd's time was occupied by conquests that he had little leisure to devote to administrative affairs. But the fact that he was able to preserve good order throughout the length and breadth of his far-flung empire bears eloquent testimony to his administrative talents. He was richly endowed with a creative and constructive genius, but he did not introduce any new legislation or innovations like other great kings. This was perhaps because he had no time to do that. Persian institutions and the laws of the Shariyat served his purpose well, and without wasting his time in formulating new laws and introducing new institutions, he contented himself with whatever ready-made he had. For the effective and efficient administration of his kingdom he created an official machinery and put it in charge of a responsible officer who was officially known as Wasir.† The Wasir was the most important man in the kingdom, next only to the monarch. The first to occupy this position under Mahmūd was 'Abdul Abbās Fazl bin Ahmad, a man of wide and varied experience and an expert in the art of government.‡ Abbas remained in office for a

* V G , 169

† For details on the subject, see last chapter. Also see S A M A , 161 ff., and V G , 135-37

‡ He had gained enough administrative experience during his service under Subuktigin and the Sāmānids period of about ten years and acquitted himself very admirably. But the jealousies of the nobles aroused by his rise, coupled with his refusal to surrender a favourite slave of his to the Sultān and some alleged misappropriation of State revenue, brought about his fall. While Mahmūd was out on an Indian expedition, he was treated so tyrannically that he succumbed to the tortures to which he was subjected.[†] The next man who became Wazīr was Shams-ul-Kufāt Abul Qāsim Ahmad bin Hāsan al-Maimandī, a man of great culture and refinement, an able administrator and, above all, a school-fellow and foster brother of the Sultān. He enjoyed the confidence of the king for not less than eighteen years and during this long period he gave ample proof of his genius for government, devotion to duty, discipline and loyalty, and established his reputation so strongly that his name passed on from generation to generation as one of the wisest and most upright ministers in the Muslim world. Unfortunately, however, he too, like the first Wazīr, incurred the enmity of the nobles by disregarding them, and the result was that he also met the same fate—was dismissed and sent a prisoner to one

(S A M A, 164, and M G, 135)

* T Y, 265-73, Asār-ul-Wuzarā, Dastūr-ul-Wuzarā, S A M A, 164-65, and M G, 135

† 'Shams ul-Kufāt' was the title of this Wazīr (Vide T Y, 346, L H P, II, 105, S N, Pt I, Ch vii, 51 and Pt II, Ch vi, 53). In E & D, Vol II, p 486, it is written as Shams-ul-Kah, which is nonsense.

of the forts of India * Apparently, it was the second time that the opposition of the nobles compelled Mahmūd to throw out his minister. Since the safety and stability of the government depended very largely on the good-will and co-operation of the nobility, both the monarch and his minister had to respect their feelings and to carry out their wishes. In order, therefore, to eliminate the element of opposition to the Wazīr Mahmūd asked them to select four men and to submit their names to him, so that he might choose one of them as his Wazīr. This was done, and the Sultān considered the qualifications of each individual candidate and said that the first Abul Qāsim, was indispensable in the military department, that the second, Abul Hasan lacked polished manners, that the third, Ahmad, was most useful in the refractory province of Khwārizm, and that the fourth, Hasanak, † was the fittest man, both by ability and descent, but was unfortunately too young to occupy that exalted office. The nobles noted that the Sultān

* Jawāmi-ul-Hikāyat, I, viii, 9, T M, 211, T Y, 272-73, S A M A, 165-66, S N, 206, and Asār ul-Wuzarā

† His real name as given by Gardīzī is Hasan bin Muhammad al Mīkālī. (Z A, 96) According to Firishta, it was Ahmad Hasan bin Mīkāl (T F, i, 38) 'Utbī calls him Abu 'Alī Hasan bin Muhammad bin Abbās (T Y, 329) and on his authority Khwāndmīr speaks of him as Abu 'Alī Husain (recte Hasan) bin Muhammad (Dastūr ul-Wuzarā in E & D, ii, 151). Hasanak is the diminutive or familiar form of Hasan (S I M H, 156) was most favourably inclined towards the youngest candidate and, knowing that all the four candidates would be rejected if they did not declare for him, they unanimously voted for Hasanak who accepted the office and occupied it till the death of the Sultān * The election of a vāhēl by the officials and the selection of one Wazir from it by the Sultān and giving reasons, in brief, for the appointment of one and the rejection of others in a constitution in which there was no organized public opinion made the king constitutional at least in this respect, for the method of selection was decidedly better than arbitrary appointment † While assuming the command of his army,—for most of his life he spent in camp,—he left the prosaic task of administration to his talented ministers who displayed considerable tact and ability in the management of State affairs. His civil officers had the efficiency that was required of them The result was that the administration was based on the principles of justice and equity, and law and order were maintained so vigorously that “the lion and the fox drank side by side from the same stream.” Trade and commerce were protected, “so that caravans could freely pass between Khurāsān and Lāhore” Provincial governors were warned to be strictly honest in their dealings They were kept under strict control and were not allowed to oppress the people in any way. The activities of the shopkeepers were regularly watched, and the Sultān himself appointed officers to supervise the weights and measures used by the merchants.* Yet with all their extraordinary genius, they were wanting in the breadth of vision which, if they had, would have enabled them to consolidate with their far-sighted statesmanship what their king had conquered by his superior military genius. We cannot deny that they were clever and thorough in their work, but the fact cannot escape recognition that, like common-place administrative experts, they were devoid of idealism and that an empire without ideals cannot last long †

* T M , 208-11, 453-54, T Y , 329-33, K T , ix, 239 , and S A M A , 166-67

† S A M A , 166-67

Mahmūd's claims to cultural greatness are equally well-founded. He was a liberal patron of art and literature and under him Ghaznīn rose to the rank of a stately city, containing such masterpieces of art as "the Celestial Bride" and such educational institutions as the Grand University. His patronage of poetry has rightly passed into a proverb.

Mahmūd was not without some weaknesses ‡
Mahmud's weaknesses He was self-willed and stubborn. He was fierce when his will was thwarted and had no stomach for defeat in

* T M, 664, T Y, 332, and S N, 41

† S V G, 69 70

‡ "There was in him", says Allāma Ibn ul Asir, "nothing which could be blamed save that he would seek arguments, though he had the grace to acknowledge his mistakes in cooler moments after momentary fits of indignation.² Tolerant towards the Zimmīs (non-Muslims) to a fairly high degree, his attitude towards the non-Sunni Muslims was positively hostile.³ He could not tolerate the slightest departure from belief in the orthodox Sunni sect.⁴ He appointed *Mulatasib*s (censors) to supervise the religious life of his subjects and to punish them for heresy and moral delinquency. The Carmathians, Bātīnis and other non-Sunnīs were captured, imprisoned and impaled, and their literature was destroyed without the least compassion. In the words of Dr M Nazīm "An invaluable store of learning which the liberal policy and scholarly zeal of the Buwāihids had accumulated in the course of years was thus consumed in an instant to satisfy the enthusiasm of the puritan warrior".⁵ Though honest and to obtain money in every way". The Allāma has laid his finger on a weak spot in Mahmūd's character. On receipt of money from a wealthy man, accused of Carmathian heresy, he issued a certificate testifying to the soundness of his religious beliefs. But this does not imply that he was greedy. The need and not the greed for money, as already pointed out, led him sometimes to resort to objectionable means for acquiring it.

* This intolerance does not seem to have been genuine. It was most probably occasioned by the hostile attitude of the Sunni Khalīfa of Baghdād who had declared a war against the Fātimid Khalīfa of Cairo who championed the cause of the family of the Prophet Muhammad. The political motives which influenced his attitude towards the non-Sunnīs takes most of the fanatic out of Mahmūd, unright in daily life, he did not shrink from having recourse to underhand means when they served his purpose well in political and administrative matters. As the founder of a dynasty, he was a failure and in the matter of deciding the question of succession to the throne after his death he cannot escape the blame of short-sightedness. In 1017 A.C. he nominated Mas'ud as his successor,^{*} but in 1018 A.C. he left Muhammad as his deputy at Ghaznī and asked the Khalifa of Baghdād to give preference to his name over that of his brother, Mas'ud, in official correspondence. This engendered hostilities between the two brothers and led to the formation of two parties, which made confusion worse confounded.[†] Later he divided the almost unwieldy empire between Mas'ud and Muhammad, but here again he betrayed the same partiality.[‡] This added fuel to the fire and set it ablaze. Shortly before his death, he disinherited Mas'ud and nominated Muhammad as the sole monarch of his dominions after his death. This was a blunder of the first magnitude and the Sultān cannot be exonerated.

but it also reveals a weakness of character—violation of the most elementary principles of morality for ulterior motives.

* T.M., 256

† Ibid., 258

‡ The division of the empire was well thought out, for it had become extremely difficult to control the outlying provinces from Ghaznī, but the division was far from judicious, for it favoured one and handicapped the other.

§ T.M., 27-28

of the charge of unduly favouring his younger son, especially when he knew too well that the elder, was the abler of the two brothers *

From the preceding analysis of Mahmūd's His Estimate character it is evident that his virtues far-outweighed his weaknesses and his constructive work fully overshadows all that he destroyed. Everything considered, he was by far the greatest king of his age and one of the greatest personalities of the world. Referring to the two extreme view-points about his character and work—the Hindus representing him as a veritable Hun and the Muslims adoring him as a hero after their own hearts, i.e., a Wali-allah†—Professor Ishwari Prasad thus expresses his opinion with touching brevity —

“The impartial observer must, however, record a different verdict. To him the Sultān was a born leader of men, a just and upright ruler, an intrepid and gifted soldier, a dispenser of justice, a patron of letters, and deserves to be ranked among the greatest personalities of the world ”‡

* T N , 91-93

† He is frequently spoken of by Muslims as a Wali-allah (saint) endowed with miraculous powers

‡ A Short History of Muslim Rule in India, by Dr Ishwari Prasad, 55, and M I , 115

CHAPTER VIII

SULTAN MAS'UD I

Sultān Māhmūd left three sons, viz. Mas'ūd, Muhammād and Nasr, of whom the Introduction first-named was the eldest and the last-named the youngest and a minor.* As early as 406 A.H. (=1015-16 A.C.) Māhmūd had nominated Mas'ūd as his successor and made his nobles swear allegiance to him † Later, he was annoyed with the 'riotous conduct' of the heir-apparent and made up his mind to bequeath his kingdom to his second son, Muhammād, who had made his way into the favours of his father during the expulsion of his brother. As a shrewd and experienced politician, Māhmūd knew too well that Mas'ūd was the abler of the two rival claimants and more qualified to rule in those troubled times. He therefore contemplated a division of the Empire but the idea was dropped probably because it aggravated the rivalry between the brothers and led to the formation of two parties and the creation of further troubles. Fortified with the permission of the Khalifa to nominate his successor and following the precedent of the Ommavide Khalifas, notably Muāwīya, he declared Muhammād as his successor and managed to instal him as such. He got his name inserted in the Khutba and made his nobles take oath of allegiance to him.*

* T. V., 256. Dr Ishāqī Pīrī (V. I., 119) says that Mas'ūd was Muhammād's "younger brother", but as he does not cite his authority, it is not safe to accept his statement as correct.

† T. V., 256.

The story of the struggle for succession between Mas'ūd and Muhammad is a mere repetition of that of the contest for kingdom between Mahmūd and his brother, Ismā'il. At the time of Mahmūd's death Mas'ūd was away in charge of the government of Isfahān. In his absence Muhammad was elevated to the throne and the local grandees renewed their allegiance to him in accordance with the will of the late Sultān. When Mas'ūd received information about all this, he wrote a letter of condolence to his brother, Muhammad, expressing profound sorrow at the demise of his revered father and called upon him to acknowledge his superior claims by giving precedence to his name in the Khutba and the coins †. Muhammad offered a flat refusal and

* Vide T. M., 27-28, 151, 258, Jawāmi'-ul-Hikāyāt, I, XI, 46, Baizawi in E & D, II, 256, T. N., 14, T. F., I, 40, and Revertys T. N., 85 f n 9, 91, 92 f n 4 and 93

† Mas'ūd refused to acquiesce in Muhammad's succession and asserted his own claims on the following grounds, viz., (1) In his early years his father had declared him as his Wali-Ahad or heir-apparent (2) The Khalīfa of Baghdād had granted him Manshūr and Karāmat (diploma of investiture and robe of honour respectively) and thus vindicated his right to succeed to his father, and this, according to him, was the strongest ground (3) He commanded the confidence of three prominent classes, viz., nobles, commoners and religious people (4) He possessed

Mas'ud had no alternative but to resort to the arbitrament of the sword. As soon as he arrived from Isfahān, the people took up his cause and the army also sided with him. Muhammad was taken prisoner, blinded and confined in the fort of Walwālīj,¹ while Mas'ud ascended the throne and the requisite qualifications for kingship, i.e. ability to rule and the tact to command respect of his officers.

It may be noted here that the idea of having his claims to succession recognized by the Khalīfa of Baghdād had occurred to him quite early and he had sent an envoy to Al-Qādir Billah, the Khalīfa of Baghdād, with rich presents, and requested him to recognize his title. In addition to the presents sent, Mas'ud had also promised to send a sum of 200,000 dīnārs and 10,000 pieces of cloth every year to the Khalīfa if his request was acceded to. In return for all this, his request was granted and the Khalīfa was pleased to send him a formal diploma of investiture, conferring upon him the titles and territories of his father, with the additional title of Zāhir-ul-Khilāfat-ullah Amir-ul-Ummānīn. Mas'ud regarded this as a great victory and fully exploited it in his struggle for succession (Vide T. V, 16-17, 49, 50 ff., 86, 101, 127, 533, T. N., 1, 312, and T. F., 1, 40).

* This word has a number of variants. Gardīzī calls it Walaq (Z. A., 95). He is followed by Nizām ud-Dīn Ahmad (T. A., 11) and Ferishta (T. F., 1, 40). Ferishta further adds that in those days Walaq was also called Khalaq by the people of Qandhār (Ibid.). Baihaqī calls it Walwālīj (T. V., 693, 695, 696). He locates it on the road running between Kābul and Balkh (Ibid., 350). Mīnhāj-us-Sirāj (T. N., 343, 349, 359) calls it Walakh (recte Walaj). It appears that a dot was left out by the scribe and thus Walwālīj was converted into Walwālīj. Elliot's translation has it as Balbaj (recte Walwālīj). He identifies it with Kelāt-i-Ghilzāī (E & D., 11, 192, foot-note), but his conjecture does not carry weight in the presence of assumed the reins of kingship with great care and caution

Immediately after his accession to the throne, Sultān Mas'ūd ordered the release of Khwāja Ahmad bin Hasan al-Maimandī, brought him out of prison and reinstated him in his previous post. It was only after an unusually great reluctance and extraordinary pressure brought to bear upon him by the Sultān that he accepted the ministerial portfolio, but not before his duties and obligations, powers and privileges were clearly defined. He submitted a written statement, containing terms and conditions of service and got it approved by the Sultān before accepting the office * When he was formally brought

Professor Hodivala's postulation, identifying it with Walwālij, the place where Sultān Mahmūd had a mint (S I-M H, 190) Some of the coins struck at the said mint are preserved in the British Museum (C O C, II, p 148, No 503) It was a town in Tukhāristān (L E C, 428) According to Abul Fida, it was the capital of that place (A A iii, 88, note)

* It was customary in those days for the Grand Wazir of the Ghaznawids to submit a written statement, technically called Mawazir (مَوْزِعَة), containing the duties and obligations of the Wazir and defining his powers and privileges in relation to and as against other Wazirs and high officials and even as against the Sultān himself and to get it approved by the Sultān before swearing allegiance to the throne and writing down an oath of allegiance (E & D, ii, 65-67) Similar statements were indited and signed by some other Wazirs and the terms and conditions to the Royal Court, the Sultān invested him with powers and privileges second only to his own. After that he was taken to the royal wardrobe, so that he might put on the official costume prescribed for the Grand Wazīr. Dressing himself in a garment of scarlet cloth of Baghdād, which was profusely worked with gold-thread, donning an Amāma (turban) of the finest muslin cloth, fringed with beautiful borders and decorated with a chain, and putting on a girdle of 1,000 misqāls, studded with turquoise, he appeared before the Sultān and offered him a beautiful bunch of pearls, valuing at 10,000 dirhams. In return, the Sultān presented him with his own ring, beset with a turquoise and having his own name inscribed in it. The Khwāja gratefully accepted the proffered present and swore allegiance to the Sultān. When he went home, people went to greet him in great numbers and showered such valuable presents on him as articles of gold and silver, fine pieces of cloth, camels, horses and Turkish slaves. Having collected the presents and gifts, the Khwāja sent them to the Sultān. Impressed by his unselfishness, the Sultān ordered 'Abdūs, one of his personal attendants, to take 10,000 laid therein were formally approved by the Grand Wazīr. The Mawāza' was thus a covenant or contract of service between the employer and employee, defining the duties and obligations, powers and privileges of the parties in relation to each other. The Khwāja submitted a similar statement to the Sultān before accepting the office of Grand Wazīr and obtained his sanction (S., dinārs, 50,000 dirhams, ten Turkish slaves, five horses from the royal stud and ten camels as presents from him.* Once liberated and restored to his previous position,† the talented Khwāja

* The man who took the presents of the Sultān to the Khwājī was called 'Abdūs (عبدوس). The original is سعی خاص و ده اشتر عدوس زید او نه : e 'Abdūs took five special horses (reserved for the use of the Sultān) and ten camels to him. The translation in E & D, ii, 72 is as follows "So he ordered five horses and ten 'Abdūs camels to be taken to him." There is and ought to be no isāfat after زید and 'Abdūs camels is a sheer nonsense. Professor Ishwari Prasad (M I, 163) has followed E & D without ascertaining the meaning of 'Abdūs camels and comprising the translation in E & D with the original and hence repeated the error. In the same passage (E & D, ii, 72) 'Abdūs is referred to as camels. The original is - حون عبدوس نا ایں کا امت تردنگ - دو اور سید حواہم حاسب نہ رکھتے e : "When 'Abdūs approached the Khwājī with these presents, the Khwājī rose up and 'Abdūs then returned." It is quite clear from the original that 'Abdūs was an important officer of the Sultān, who took presents to the Khwājī, because the latter rose up at his arrival as a mark of respect. Moreover, we have enough evidence to show that 'Abdūs was a favourite personal attendant of Sultan Mīrād. His full name was Abu S'ad bin 'Abdul Wazīz (Z A, 98, and T A, 11). He is frequently referred to by Būhiqī, extracts from whose book are translated in E & D, ii, 62, 90-92, 101. The translation of the above extract in E & D is as follows "When the camels brought the presents before the khwājī, he rose up. The camels then returned." What a funny translation!

† He had served Sultān Mahmūd as his Wazir for a period of 18 years, but was condemned owing to the old charge of his having subscribed to the Carmathian creed. We are not in possession of any details about the charge, but prima facie and to all intents and purposes it was false and frivolous. Moreover, that episode had been closed during the reign of Sultān Mahmūd and there was no justification for reopening it.* Failing to substantiate this charge, Mas'ūd referred the matter to the Khalīfa of Baghdād and obtained his sanction for the execution of Hasanak † The sanction of the Khalīfa was in itself a weighty argument in support of Hasanak's execution. Armed with the decree of the Khalīfa, the Sultān subjected the victim of his wrath to a great humiliation and ordered him to be stoned to death. When the victim

* See supra, p. 93. The gravamen of the charge against Hasanak was that he had received a robe of honour from Al Zāhir, the Khalīfa of Cairo, but Mahmūd had sent the said robe of honour to the Khalīfa of Baghdād, who had ordered the execution of the recipient, and it had been burnt to ashes in a public square at Baghdād. The episode was thus closed and the case was res judicata. Mas'ūd was not justified in reopening the question and subjecting the ex-Prime Minister to such a fate.

† The Khalīfa of Baghdād had been annoyed when Hasanak was favoured with a robe of honour by the anti-Khalīfa of Cairo and he had written to Mahmūd on the subject. Mahmūd had appeased him by sending the robe in question to Baghdād where it had been burnt. Apparently the Khalīfa was not satisfied with the punishment. He gave full vent to his deep-seated resentment against Hasanak by ordering him to be stoned to death when the matter was referred to him by Mas'ūd.

the Sultān to do away with the ex-Minister—so important was the institution of Wizārat. In order to do what he desired, Mas'ūd tried so many methods but failed and succeeded only when he shelved the responsibility on the shoulders of a more powerful person in the Muslim world—the Khalīfa.⁸ The Hasanak tragedy also shows how unsafe and uncertain life and office of the minister were under the later Ghaznavids.

In this connection we may appropriately point out that in the matter of appointing his Wazīr, Mas'ud pursued the policy of his father. After the death of Ahmad bin Hasan al Maimandī, he convened a council of his high officials, such as 'Arīz, the Commander of the army, and the Chief Minister of the Ceremonies. In their presence he expressed profound sorrow at the demise of his capable and trusted Wazīr, paid a glowing tribute to him, spoke highly of his loyalty and love of truth, discipline and devotion to duty, ability and efficiency and then asked them to suggest the name of someone who might prove a suitable successor in the vacant office. After a long discussion, during which several names were suggested and rejected, the choice fell on Abū Nasr Ahmad bin Muhammad bin 'Abdus Samad, who had been the Sāhib-i-Dīwān of Hārūn, the then Governor of Khwārizm. He was formally invited and asked to take over the charge of the vacant office.*

⁸ Tarikh-i-Yamini (Tehrān edition), 429, and Tarikh-i-Ba haqī |, 207.

On his death, the ruler of Mekrān left two sons, rūz, Isā and Abul 'Asākar of whom the former commanded the confidence of the army and the respect of the people and was therefore successful in asserting his claims. Failing to cope with him successfully, the latter personally waited upon Mas'ud and requested him to intervene on his behalf. In response to his request, the Sultān put a huge army at the disposal of Abul 'Asākar and ordered it to accompany him. Reaching near Mekrān, the Commander of the army conveyed the Imperial message to Isā, calling upon him to make a compromise with his brother, but he paid no heed to it. In the battle that was fought Isā was killed and most of his men surrendered. Abul 'Asākar took possession of Mekrān and, as already agreed to, inserted the name of Mas'ud in the Khutba and the coins, indicating that he was a vassal of the Sultān. All this happened in the year 422 A H (=1031 A C).† The same year also witnessed the annexation of Kirmān. Abū Kalījār bin Sultān-ud-Daulah was defeated and put to flight by the Imperial army sent against him. Kirmān was occupied, but was lost again to the Ghaznawids.

* T. F., I, 41, T. V., 177-78

† I. H., II, vii, 274 75, T. F., I, 41.

owing to the slackness of the Hindū army.*

'Alā-ud-Daulah, whom Sultān Mahmūd had left with Mas'ūd in Isfahān and who had made an unsuccessful attempt to carve out an independent kingdom for himself, was putting up with Abū Kālījār in Khozistān after his expulsion from Isfahān in the hope of receiving support from him. As soon as he heard of Mahmūd's death, he collected an army, took possession of Isfahān with its help and advanced towards Hamadān with a view to seize Raīy. Mas'ūd's governor of that province inflicted a sharp defeat on him and compelled him to retreat to Isfahān. He was pursued thither and reduced to such straits that he withdrew to the fort of Qarohān in mean disguise and took shelter there. After these events Mas'ūd's sway was firmly established in Raīy, Jurjān and Tabaristān. On three more occasions 'Alā-ud-Daulah tried to re-establish his authority and recover his lost possessions but failed. He was defeated and put to flight on every occasion †.

Majd-ud-Daulah, a former ruler of Isfahān whom Sultān Mahmūd had defeated and deprived of his sovereignty, tried to avail himself of the disturbed state of affairs occasioned by the death of the

* I K, II, XII, 274 ff, T F, 1, 41

† I K, II, XII, 275 ff, T F 1, 41

Great Sultān and aggravated by the struggle for succession between Mas'ūd and Muhammad But he was badly defeated and put to flight by the Governor of Rāy who was entrusted with the command of the army sent against him *

Recovery and loss of Khwārizm

While Mas'ūd was involved in the fratricidal war, 'Altīgīn, the ruler of Bukhārā, collected his forces and attacked Altūntāsh, the Governor of Khwārizm After the new Sultān had firmly established his authority, he sent a huge army to Khwārizm and directed its Governor to lead a punitive expedition against Altīgīn When attacked by the Imperialists, the ruler of Bukhārā took to flight and a large part of his territory was occupied by Altūntāsh After the conquest was completed Altūntāsh returned to Khwārizm On the way he was attacked by the soldiers of 'Altīgīn who were lying in ambush and awaiting his return He turned round and again dispersed them Then he called his men together and said that he had received a grievous wound during the last encounter and that it was impossible for him to survive it A peace was then concluded with 'Altīgīn, according to which Bukhārā was handed over to Mas'ūd and the territory on the other side of Samarqand was given to 'Altīgīn Altūntāsh succumbed to the fatal wound he had received and his post was conferred upon his son, Hārūn, in recognition of his services 'Abdul Jabbār, who was sent by the Central Government to act as his deputy, could not pull on with him and returned to Ghaznīn where he poisoned the Sultān's mind against his rival Sultān Mas'ūd, without investigating the matter, ordered Shāh Malak to proceed against Hārūn. Khwārizm was attacked and occupied by force Hārūn and his brother, Ismā'il, took to flight and sought safety with Tughral Beg and Dāud who, at their request, attacked Khwārizm and took possession of it *

* I K, II, vi, 273-74

Sultān Mahmūd had constituted Jurjān[†] and Tabaristān into a separate province and placed it in charge of a Tabaristān Ziyārid Prince, called Dārā bin Mīnūchihr bin Qābūs and married one of his daughters to him When Mas'ūd ascended the throne, he confirmed Dārā in his possession Availing himself of the disturbances in the Ghaznawid Empire, Dārā stopped to send tribute to Ghaznīn at the instigation of 'Alā ud-Daulah and his friend, Farhād After quelling the disturbances of the Turkomans, Mas'ūd turned his attention towards Dārā. The Imperial army defeated the rebellious vassal and occupied Jurjān in 424-25 A H (=1034 A C) Pursued from place to place and reduced to utter helplessness, he sought and received royal forgiveness

* I K, II, viii, 279 ff., T F, i, 41

† Jurjān (ancient Hyrcania) is also called Gurgān in some accounts Its present capital is Astrābād.

on the condition of paying tribute regularly every year *

When Sultān Mas'ud turned his attention towards India he found that Arīyāraq, Condition of India who had been put at the helm of affairs in India by Sultān Mahmūd, had become a perfect autocrat and begun to disobey the Imperial fīrmāns † With seductive wiles and sugar-coated words, he was wheedled out of India by Khwāja Ahmad Hasan and taken to Ghaznīn There he was invited to a drinking feast and made to drink heavily He was then bound in chains and sent to Ghūr and thrown into prison, where he was probably poisoned to death The wealth he had accumulated during his viceroyalty of India was confiscated His friend, Asīghtīgīn,‡ shared his fate soon afterwards The officer who was next entrusted with the viceroyalty of the Indian Province was Ahmad Nīvältīgīn, an experienced hind, who had acquired ample knowledge of public affairs

* Vide Z A , 99, T A , 12, E & D , ii, 196, T F , i, 41, and L H P , ii, 169

† "Secure in possession of a vast territory without any restraining influences, the Ghaznavide Commander of Hind who was an ambitious man by nature had given proof of his ambitious designs even in the time of Mahmūd, but so great was the awe in which that mighty conqueror was held that the plans of Arvarak were never allowed to mature" (V I , 123 24)

‡ T II , 97, T I , (Delhi Lith Ed) 281 Sir W Haig wrongly calls him Asaftīgīn (C H I , iii, 28)

during his service under Mahmūd the Great. Khwāja Ahmad Hasan, the Grand Wazīr, invested him with the official robes of honour and instructed him to be true to the conditions of the covenant he had entered into with the Sultān. He also advised him not to encroach upon the jurisdiction of the Shīrāzī Qāzī,* the civil administrator who was a most quarrelsome colleague, to co operate with the Superintendent of the Intelligence Department, whose duty was to keep the Sultān informed of all that happened in India, and to discharge his duties diligently and honestly. After administering the necessary advice, he addressed him the following warning "You must not say anything to any person respecting the political and revenue matters, so that no one's word may be heard against you, but you must perform all the duties of the commander, so that the fellow may not be able to put his hand upon your sinews and drag you down." Some of the Dailamite chiefs and head-strong slaves, who had been found guilty of sundry acts of disobedience, were sent with him to India and he was directed to keep a strict watch on their movements and to regulate their social activities in such a manner that they might not be able to create any trouble. Before sending him to India, the Khwāja prevailed upon him to leave his son in Ghaznīn, nominally on the pretext of giving him a suitable education but actually to keep him as a hostage so that his father might not have the audacity to rebel. Later when the governor-designate of India waited upon the Sultan, the latter addressed him in these words "Ahmad rejoice and be happy, be careful to understand the value of this favour, keep my image ever before your eyes and do good service so that you may attain to great honour." Despite the advice of the Sultan and of the Grand Wazir and the fact that his son was at the mercy of the higher authorities he too, to quote Baihqi, 'turned away from the path of rectitude and took a crooked course.' When he assumed the charge of his office, he found it hard to pull on with his powerful and quarrelsome colleague, Abul Hasan, the Shirazi Qazi, who was a hot-headed and arrogant administrator. Since he refused to consult the Qazi in the discharge of his duties, a quarrel ensued between the two and jeopardized the position of the Ghaznawids in India. The dispute related to the appointment of the command of an expedition. It was referred to the Central Government and the Qazi was ordered to mind his own business and not to meddle in military affairs. Soon after that Niyāltugīn undertook an expedition against Benares, one of the sacred cities of the Hindus, renowned for its riches all over India and untouched by the spears of the legions of Islām as yet.*

* His original name was Abul Hasan

* Abul Fazl (Ain-i-Akbari) has stated that Mahmud twice visited Benares. This statement lacks contemporary confirmation. 'Utbī and Gardīzī make no mention about

Success greeted the invader who returned laden with immense spoils. The Qāzī was shocked to hear of the success of his rival and spared nothing to poison Mas'ūd's mind against him and to bring him to disgrace. He sent his spies to Ghaznī to inform the Sultān that the Viceroy had possessed himself of a vast amount of wealth and begun to behave independently, giving himself out as a son of Sultan Mahmūd. Reports received from various sources confirmed Mas'ūd's doubts and he sent against him his Hindū general, Nath, who was defeated and killed. A number of other officers offered their services against the Indian Viceroy, but the choice fell on another Hindū, Tilak,* the son of a barber, who was entrusted this and all later historians are also silent on the subject. Such a silence would have been ignored if the observant Alberūnī had not made a categorical statement which clearly shows that Mahmūd had not seen that "Holy City." Writing in 421 A H (=1030 A C, when Mahmūd died) he observes "Hindū sciences have retired far away from those parts of the country which have been conquered by us, and have fled to places which our hand cannot yet reach, to Kashmīr, Benāres and other places" (Sachau, i, 22). Abul Fazl's evidence in this case cannot outweigh that of Alberūnī.

* There is some confusion about the name, parentage and religion of this general. He is called Tūlak bñ Husain by Ferishta (T F, i, 42), Talak bñ Husain by Nīzām ud-Dīn Ahmad (T A, 12), and Tilak son of a barber by Baihaqī (E & D, ii, 127). Still another perversion, viz., Jaisen, is found in some of the MSS of the authorities quoted above. Gardīzī states that he was the son of Jahlan (Z A, 102). It appears that the words 'Husain' and 'Jaisen' are both mistranscriptions of Jahlan or Jahlansi, which with the command of an army and ordered to proceed against India. His arrival at Lāhore struck terror into the hearts of the supporters of Niyāltīgīn, who left their leader and sought forgiveness. Deserted by his followers and feeling sure that it was impossible for him to hold out long, Niyāltīgīn fled for life. He was hotly pursued by Tilak's forces, "which consisted mainly of Hindus" and engaged in a fight at night. The Turkomans, who were still with him, left him in a body and implored forgiveness. When defeated, he managed to escape from the battle-field and successfully evaded the pursuit party. A reward of 500,000 dirhams was fixed for killing him and it was proclaimed that anyone who took his head to Tilak would receive that reward. The task was taken up in right earnest by the Jāts, who were thoroughly acquainted with the ins and outs of the desert and the wilds. They succeeded in tracing him out and bringing him to bay. They assaulted him with arrows, spears and swords. The Turkish blood boiled within him and he defended himself single-handed till he is an old name frequently found in inscriptions and dynastic lists (Chronology of India by C M Duff, 192, 297). That Tilak was a pure Hindu admits of no doubt. Baihaqī (E & D, II, 128) informs us that Tilak rendered a signal service to Mas'ud by bringing all the Hindu Kātors (Thākurs) and many outsiders under his sway. This would have been impossible if he himself had not been a paccā Hindu. Tilak alone was not a Hindu who was raised to dignity by the Ghaznawids. There were many Hindus who enjoyed such favours and ~~came~~^{up} to ~~high~~^{visible} positions under them. (See P P M T, 46).

fell fighting in a fresh encounter. The Jāts chopped off his head, sent it to Tilak and received from him a reward of 10,000 dirhams instead of the promised sum, 500,000 dirhams—that too after much haggling. Mas'ūd received the news of Tilak's victory with great satisfaction. He sent congratulatory letters to Tilak and expressed great joy over his success.

A reference may appropriately be made to Tilak's rise in the official career of Tilak. Originally a Hindū of humble origin, he was employed by Sultān Mahmūd and promoted to high rank by him in appreciation of his versatile accomplishments. He was a man of handsome appearance and charming manners. Khwāja Ahmad Hasan was literally enamoured of him. He made him his private secretary and employed him as an official interpreter between the State and the Hindūs. A gold-embroidered robe, a jewelled necklace, a fine canopy and a precious parasol were given to him as marks of distinction and kettle-drums were beaten and ensigns of gilded tops were set afloat at his residence as indications of his superiority. "Thus", says Dr Ishwari Prasad, "was a Hindū entrusted with an important command. This elevation of men of humble birth to high rank on the ground of merit alone was a principle which was invariably followed by Muslim administrators in India"*. The elevation of talented Hindus to high posts and positions was not viewed with surprise by the broad-minded Muslims of the day. The philosophical Baihaqi, referring to the rise of Tilak, thus expresses himself "Wise men do not wonder at such facts because no body is born great, men become such. But it is important that they should leave a good name behind."

Capture of Hānsī and Sonpat Elated by Tilak's success in India and ignoring, consciously or unconsciously, the dangers which seriously threatened the Ghaznawid possessions in the west, Mas'ud made up his mind to lead an expedition to the 'Virgin Fort' of Hānsī,^f and thus fulfil the vow which he had once taken during his illness. In vain did the Khwāja try to impress upon his mind the impolicy of such a step "The vow is upon my own person", he said, and advising his ministers and high officials to co-operate with one another and carry on the business of the State efficiently during his absence, he invested the Khwāja with plenary powers and set out at the head of a huge army in 1037 A.C. and reached the town of Hānsī after a long and arduous journey. The fort was considered as impregnable by the Hindus, but the Musalmāns

* Ibid., 128

^f The city of Hānsī is situated 11 miles to the east of Hisār. It has a ruined castle (Tieffenthaler Description Historique et Géographique De L'Inde, Vol. 1, p. 134)

laid mines under it at five places, took it by storm within ten days and seized enormous spoils Entrusting the charge of the newly conquered place to a reliable officer, Mas'ūd advanced against Sonpat,* which was situated in the vicinity of Delhi, and occupied it without experiencing the least opposition from its chief who is said to have fled into the forest at the approach of the invader, leaving behind his treasure which was taken possession of by the Muslim soldiers After winning these victories and fulfilling his vow, Mas'ūd marched back to Ghaznī and gave himself up wholly to drinking and merry-making.†

Campaign against the Saljuqs Hardly had Mas'ūd ascended the throne and assumed the reins of government when he found himself confronted with the Saljuq menace The Saljuqs had begun to make encroachments on the dominions of Sultān Mahmūd towards the close of his reign and disturbed his peace of mind Taking advantage of his death, they began to make inroads into Khurāsān and create disturbances at many places At first they did not attract Mas'ūd's personal attention and his generals were able to establish his authority in the refractory provinces of the west, as we have already noted. The peace made by them under their leader, Altūqīn* with the Ghaznawid Commander, Altūntash,† in 1032 A C proved to be a truce, for they continued to carry their raids into the Ghaznawid Empire. The people of the outlying provinces complained against their aggression and Mas'ud made up his mind to advance against them in person. He first attacked Transoxiana and occupied it, but his soldiers suffered enormously on account of snow and cold. About that time Balkh was invaded by the Saljuqs under their leader, Dāūd. Post-haste the Sultan proceeded towards Balkh. In his absence Tughral Beg, the Saljuq, attacked and plundered Ghaznīn. When the Sultan reached Balkh Dāūd marched back to Marv. After restoring law and order in Balkh, Herāt and Nishāpur, he turned his attention towards Tughral Beg. At Dangānqīn he was confronted by the Turkomans. Deserted by many of his followers, including an Indian army, Mas'ud suffered a crushing defeat at the hands of his enemies on the 23rd of March, 1040 A C.‡ He marched

* The city of Sonpat is situated to the north of Delhi, not far from it (Ibid, i, 133)

† The Indian expedition, despite the victories won there, proved to be a colossal blunder During Mas'ūd's absence the Saljuqs strengthened their position and ultimately established their authority (Vide infra)

* Dr Ishwari Prasad (V I, 132) calls him Alptigin, but does not cite his authority. See I A, II, vii, 279 ff and T F, i, 41, where his name is given as 'Altūqīn.'

† Dr Ishwari Prasad calls him Altūmīsh (Ibid.) without mentioning his authority. See I A, II, vii, 279 ff and T F, i, 41, where his name is written as Altūntash.

‡ Authorities are in variance about the date as well as the place of this battle.

Date — Three dates are most frequently found, viz., back to Marv and then proceeded to Ghaznīn via Ghur. Far from being able to raise an army strong enough to stem the rising tide of the Saljuqs, he could not now quell the disturbances that cropped up about Ghaznīn. Place after place slipped away from his possession in rapid succession and he was constrained to concentrate his attention on India. Eventually he decided to withdraw towards India. In vain again did the Khwāja insist on his stay at the capital and remind him of the detrimental consequences of his obstinacy *

430, 431 and 432 A H I have preferred the second, i.e., 431 (= 1040 A C), because it is based on better and more reliable sources, viz., T M, 777, T N, 1, 92, L & D, 11, 198, and T F, 1, 43

Place. The author of the Tabqāt-i Nāsiri (L & D, 1, 273) locates the site of the battle at Taliqān and he has been followed by many modern writers, including Sir W. Hug (C H I, m, 31). The more authoritative opinion, however, is in favour of Dandāqān. Gardīzī (Z A, 107), Būhaqī (T M, 792-94), Nizām-ud-Dīn Ahmad (T A, 25 of B I S), and Ferishtā (T F, 1, 43) all locate the battle field at the latter place. It is also called Dandāqān in some MSS. It has been described by Abul Fida as a small town of Khurāsān, famous for its cotton fabrics. It is about forty miles north-west of Marv ur-Rūd or Marvchak (Marv-i-Kūchik) on the Marvchak-Sarakhs Road. The town of Taliqān is about fifty miles south-east of Marv-ur-Rūd. Sir T. Holdich calls it Dandālqān and says that it was near Ak-tepe, which is not far from Panjdeh (Gates of India, 244-46).

* The Khwāja's prognostication proved only too true. Subsequent events testified to the soundness of his advice and showed that Mas'ud's fears were ill-founded and his

After appointing Maudūd to the government of Balkh, Majdūd to that of Multān

Flight to India and Amir Izad to that of Ghaznīn and making other necessary arrangements, Mas'ūd proceeded towards India bag and baggage Hardly had he crossed the Indus and reached Marīgala * when his own guards, consisting of Turkish and Hindū slaves, robbed him of the treasure he was carrying with him on the backs of camels Then followed a wild confusion and a general mutiny of the army While Mas'ūd was taken prisoner and sent to the fort at Gīrī, † his brother Muhammad, whom he had blinded before his accession, was brought out flight from Ghaznīn was an act of folly and not of wisdom, for the Saljuqs were pre-occupied with the conquest of Persia and adjoining places and Ghaznīn was immune from their attacks. (Vide Chapter IX)

* Marīgala (or Marīkala, as it is in some MSS.) is a pass situated between Attock and Rāwpindī, a few miles east of Hasan Abdāl Alberūnī (Sachau, i, 302) identifies it with Takashshila (Tavila) "The name is preserved in that of a pass and a range of hills about two miles to the south of Shāhdherī and a few miles east of Hasan Abdāl" (A G I, 111, T N, Raverty's Translation, 95 note, and S I M H, 193-94)

† This place has not been satisfactorily identified and its site is not precisely located In his Notes on Afghānistān, p 131 note, Raverty identifies it with Gibarkot in Kunar (Kāfiristān) From the text of T M (E & D, ii, 273) it appears that it was not far from Marīkala or Marīgala where Mas'ūd's treasure was looted by his own guards Professor Hodivala's postulation that it must be Gīrī, i e Shāhbāz Gīrī or Kāpar da Gārī, which is situated in the district of Mardān about 40 miles east of and put on the throne. Being blind, Muhammad could not conduct and control the affairs of the government personally. He therefore delegated his powers to his son, Ahmad, one of whose early acts was to put an end to the life of the deposed king *. Muhammad, who was unaware of all this, is said to have cursed the perpetrators of the crime †.

Mas'ūd followed with great wisdom and vigour the illustrious traditions of his talented father. He selected his Wazīr in the same way as his father. He was also in the habit of consulting his ministers and seeking their advice on all important matters, though he did always follow their advice. Fortunately for him his ministers were not mere mediocres or flatterers. They were men of courage, character and culture who never hesitated to disagree with or even oppose him whenever they thought he was following a wrong course. His decisions to lead an expedition against Hānsī and to leave Ghaznīn for India were openly opposed by the Khwāja, and on the second occasion he was reminded of the disastrous consequences of the Peshawar does not seem to be far from the mark (S. I M H, 194-95)

* This was in the year 433 A H (=1041-42 A C). In his Habib-us-Siyār Khwāndmīr confirms this (E & D, iv, 198). Minhāj-us-Sirāj (T N) puts it in the year 432 A H which is apparently incorrect.

† T F, i, 44

the institution of Wizārat gained a great deal in power and prestige. This was because he very jealously safeguarded its dignity. He was the first Wazir who flatly refused to accept that office as long as the Sultān did not define his jurisdiction and describe his powers in writing † After a long discussion on the question, which was carried on in black and white, the Sultān found no alternative but to fall in with his proposal. If that practice had been followed by others, the institution of Wizārat would have gained great strength and stability and paved the way for the establishment of a constitutional monarchy †

Like his father, Mas'ūd too was a great patron of learning and a zealous protector of the learned. Among the celebrated scholars, who flourished under his patronage and dedicated their works to him, may be mentioned Abū Rihan Alberūnī,‡ and Abū Muhammad

* See supra, pp 186-87

† For a discussion on the subject, see S A M A, 156 ff

‡ We have had an occasion to refer to the literary attainments of Alberūnī (See supra, pp 114-16) Dr E C Sachau, who has translated two of his works, calls him "a champion of the truth, a sharply cut character of a highly individual stamp, full of real courage and not refraining from dealing hard blows when anything which is good or right seems to him to be at stake" and says that "if in these days a man began studying Sanskrit and Hindū learning with all the help afforded by modern literature and science many years would pass before he

Nāsihi From the literary works of Abū Rihān we derive a good deal of information about the progress of Arabic as well as Persian literature under his direct encouragement. The same authority further informs us that Indian mathematics, astronomy, philosophy, astrology, pharmacology, medicine and Greek sciences were sedulously studied by inquisitive Muslim scholars and that a number of Indian as well as Greek works were translated into Arabic and Persian. "During his reign" says Khwāndmīr, the author of the Rauzat-us-Safā, "so many colleges, mosques and religious edifices were built in the various parts of his dominions that it is impossible to enumerate them."⁴

Sultān Mas'ud was endowed with uncommon physical power. The contemporary historian, Baihaqī, informs us that he wielded a mace, weighing twenty māns and that in a hand to hand fight

Character & estimate would be able to do justice to the antiquity of India to such an extent and with such a degree of accuracy as al-Bīrūnī has done in his Indica". Alberūnī was indeed a literary giant with a prodigious brain power. For "a just and sympathetic appreciation of his character and attainments", see Dr Sachau's Prefaces to his translations of the Asār ul Bāqīya and the Indica. Also see L H P, i, 101 ff.

⁴ E & D, iv, 138-39. The testimony of Khwāndmīr is supported by Ferishta who says "In the beginning of his reign Mas'ad built many mosques and endowed several colleges which he caused to be erected in the different cities of his dominions." (T F, i, 44)

with a tiger he smashed the skull of the beast with a single blow * Fond of drinking and music, he frequently resorted to the Firozī Garden, his father's most favourite pleasure-resort, and sat there under a green pavilion, surrounded by his servants After reviewing the forces, he used to sit down with his favourite friends to a sumptuous feast, which was invariably accompanied by music and drinking Obstinate and self-willed, full of ambition and adventurous spirit, he was well-known for his valour and war-like zeal He was so brave and outspoken that once he offended his father by strongly supporting the maxim that 'kingdom belongs to the longest sword' He was a magnificent prince During his reign the Ghaznawid Court retained the splendour it enjoyed under Mahmūd the Great He used to consult his ministers on all matters of moment and sought their advice. He did not put them to harm even when they turned down his proposals and he had to over-rule them.†

* T M , 141 'Twenty mans' seems to be an exaggeration Ferishta seems to be correct when he says "Mas'ud's mace was so heavy that no one else could lift it up with a single hand" (T F , i, 40)

† Dr Tripathi, who has discussed the point at length, says —

"In most cases the Sultān overruled them (ministers) and had his own way which ultimately brought him to a sad end But no minister is known to have been driven out of office or penalized or even fallen from the Sultān's estimation for having opposed his proposals" (S A M S , 170)

SULTAN MAUDUD & HIS SUCCESSORS

When Mas'ūd was murdered under the orders of Ahmad son of Muhammad, his son Maudūd was away at Balkh As soon as Maudūd heard the sad news of the execution of his father, he vowed to wreak woeful vengeance on the murderers and marched post-haste to the Imperial Capital at the head of his army In an encounter at Nagarhar* he inflicted a crushing defeat on his rivals and put most of them to death He also slew his uncle, Muhammad, and all his sons except 'Abdur Rahīm whom he spared because he had shown some consideration to Mas'ūd during his captivity On the site where he won victory over his rivals he founded a town called Fatehābād or "Town of Victory" and built a big rest-house there for

* The author of the Tabqāt-i-Nāsīrī (E & D, n, 274) calls it Takarhārūd which Sir Henry Elliot has wrongly identified with Bakhrāla (Ibid, foot-note) Takarhārūd is a miswriting of Nagarhār (نگرہار) or Nagrahārī, which is said to be the old name of a town and a district in Afghānistān, situated near modern Jalālābād (G D A M A, s. n) Baihaqī locates the site of the battle in Dīnār, which is also written as Depūr and Dānpūr Professor Hodivala suggests that the last two names are the forms of Udayanapura and that the town still survives under the name 'Adīnāpur', which is represented by Bālābāgh, 12 miles from modern Jalālābād (S I-M H, 195) Nagrahara is also written as Nangnahār

the comfort and convenience of travellers *

Soon after his accession to the throne of Ghaznīn, Maudūd made Abū Nasr ^{Appointment} bin Ahmad 'Abdus Samad his Wazir, ^{of Wazirs} but dismissed him in 1041 A C and threw him in prison where he met his death. The next man who was honoured with the dignity was Khwāja Abū Tāhir bin Mastaufi. Tāhir enjoyed that dignity till 1044 A C when the vacancy was filled by Khwāja 'Abdul Fateh 'Abdur Razzāq bin Ahmad bin Hasan al-Maimandī. The last named remained in office till the close of Maudūd's reign †

Maudūd next turned his attention towards India Nāmī, the then Governor ^{-Governor of} of the Punjab appointed by Muhammad, was defeated and slain

in some accounts, but the more authoritative opinion is in favour of the former. Nangnahār and Nek-nahār seem to be later corruptions (Ibid)

* T N in E & D, II, 273-74, T M, 867, and T F, 1, 40. The town of Fatehabād has continued to our own times. It is situated some four miles south of Bālābāgh (Masson Journeys to Balochistan etc, 184)

† The active interference of the Wazir in the matter of succession occasioned bitter hostilities against him and jeopardized his position, rendering long enjoyment of power very rare. Placed between the devil and the deep sea—the Jealousies of the nobles and the suspicions of the Sultān,—he found himself in a most awkward position. As a result, his power and prestige suffered a great deal (S A M A 173-74)

by Abū Nasr Ahmad bin Muhammad, the new Governor appointed by the new Sultān and sent to India for the purpose But Maudūd's brother, Majdūd, whom his father had appointed to the government of the Indian Province had captured Thānesar and was now at Hānsī, seeking an opportunity to attack Delhi On receipt of information that his brother had sent an army against him, Majdūd lost no time in returning to Lāhore He reached there on July 27, 1042 A C and was found dead in his bed on the morning of the 30th, one or two days after the arrival of Maudūd's army The cause of his death is shrouded in mystery What it was due to—heat-stroke, heart-failure or some rapidly fatal disease or the secret agency of his brother—is a matter of speculation *

At the time of Maudūd's accession the kingdom of Ghaznīn was exposed to the onslaught of the Saljūqs, but as good luck would have it, their attention, almost wholly occupied elsewhere, was not drawn towards Ghaznīn The victorious Saljūqs divided their newly conquered territory into four minor kingdoms under the suzerainty of Tughral Beg While Tughral Beg hastened

* Majdūd had proved himself a capable commander and an energetic officer during his viceroyalty of the Indian Province and it appeared probable that the troops sent against him by his brother would declare for him Under the circumstances, it is not wholly unsafe to say that Maudūd's agents had been at work (C H I, III, 32) to complete the conquest of western Persia and was occupied in the capture of Baghdād and the overthrow of the Roman Empire at the head of the main forces of his tribe, Abū 'Alī, another adventurer, who had attained to the sovereignty of Herāt, Sīstān and Ghūr, was left to struggle with the Ghaznawids for asserting his own sovereignty. Maudūd married the daughter of Chaqar Beg.* The marriage was responsible for establishing friendly relations between the Sultān and the Saljūqs. Thus it was that Maudūd was able to maintain his position at Ghaznīn and to recover Transoxiana.†

While the Sultān was occupied in the west, Condition of India Māhipāl, the Rāja of Delhi, took advantage of his absence from India and over-ran the Punjāb, then an important province of the Ghaznawid Empire. On this occasion the Rāja successfully appealed to the superstition of the Hindūs and revived their spirits by convincing them that their Deotā (deity) was pleased with them and would help them in driving the Muslims out of India.‡

* In some accounts he is also called Chaghār Beg. Ferishta calls him Ja'far Beg Ṣaljuqī (T F., I, 44). He seems to have followed I K (II, xii, 291).

† De Guignes Vol. II, p 190, and H. I, 301-302

‡ Here is a brief description of the device. The Rāja of Delhi called together his courtiers and informed them that in a dream at night the Deotā (deity) of Nagarkot had told him that he had stayed at Ghaznīn so long simply for the sake of bringing about the down-fall of the Ghaznawids.

With the help of the neighbouring Rājas he was able to take possession of Hānsī, Thānesar and Nagarkot and to lay siege to Lāhore. But for the bravery of the Muslim garrison, the fate of the last fort of Musalmāns in India would have been sealed. The successful defence was due to the report, regarding the approach of the Sultān with a large army, which was later known to have been a mere ruse, and in Central Asia, that he had accomplished that task and was now anxious to overthrow the Ghaznawid power in India as well, and that the Hindūs should make common cause and expel the Musalmāns from the fort of Nagarkot, so that he might return to his previous abode. The Rāja's words were taken for Gospel truth and a wave of enthusiasm ran through the hearts of the Hindūs. Taking into his confidence some expert architects and a clever Brahman, the Rāja managed to set up at night in a garden in the neighbourhood of Nagarkot a replica of the idol transported to Ghaznī by Sultān Mahmūd and set afloat the news that it had come there by a miracle. Next morning the idol attracted the notice of the people who hailed it with joy mingled with surprise. Princes with valuable presents, poured in from many places and paid homage to it. The Rāja of Delhi also paid a visit to it barefooted. To everyone who visited it, the Brahman in charge said that the Deotā had ordered the Hindūs to expel the Musalmāns from the fort of Nagarkot by force and take possession of it. Thus inspired and invigorated, the Hindūs prepared themselves for the fight and volunteered themselves in large numbers. While the volunteers swelled the ranks of the Rāja's army, the presents offered to the Deotā by the votaries immensely augmented the resources of war. The result of this Machiavellian device was that the Musalmāns who occupied a fortified position, were defeated and driven out. (For details, see T F, 1, 45).

partly to the fact that the Musalmāns, who had hitherto subdued the Hindūs, disdained the very thought of being defeated by them. The Rāja and his confederates were defeated, put to flight and pursued to safe distances. In 1048 A C Maudūd appointed his sons, Mansūr and Mahmūd, to the governments of Peshāwar and Lāhore respectively and also sent Abū 'Alī Hasan, the Kotwāl of Ghaznīn, to India "to curb the aggression of the Hindūs." The Kotwāl was well known for his sternness. He acquitted himself creditably and successfully accomplished the task he was entrusted with. On his return to Ghaznīn, however, he fell a victim to an intrigue and suffered imprisonment, where he met his death.*

Campaign against the Saljūqs

We have referred to Maudūd's successes in the west and said that they were largely due to the fact that the Saljūqs were occupied elsewhere.

We may now revert to that subject and describe his wars with the Saljūqs who had begun to overrun the Ghaznavid provinces, so much so that even his matrimonial connection with the Saljūq leader proved of little use. In 1042 A C he launched a campaign against them, which continued to the close of his reign. At first the task of reducing them to submission was entrusted to Arītigīn who defeated them and occupied Balkh and had the Khutba read in the name of the Sultān. Not long after their defeat they again appeared in the neighbourhood of Balkh in such large numbers that Arītigīn was constrained to apply for reinforcements, which were not sent for some unknown reasons. The result was that the Saljūqs overran Balkh and came as far as Ghaznīn with a view to overthrow the Ghaznawid domination. But they were again defeated and put to flight by the Imperial forces sent against them. In 1044 A.C. the Sultān sent another officer to Bust. The latter reached Sīstān and brought it under the sway of the Sultān. Next year the Saljūqs again raised their heads. They advanced on Ghaznīn and when they reached near Bust they were opposed by its Governor, named Tughral*. After a pitched and bloody battle, in which numerous lives were lost, the Saljūqs suffered a terrible defeat and took to their heels. Tughral subdued Qusdār also and brought a number of

* T. F., i, 44-46, I K., II, xii, 291-3, and C H I., iii, 32-33.

* Tughral was a slave and servant of Sultān Mahmūd. He was appointed Commander of the troops of Khurāsān by Māudūd. Brave, outspoken, freedom-loving and adventurous, he tried to carve out an independent kingdom for himself. He contracted friendly relations with the Saljūqs and rebelled against the Sultān. When defeated and driven out, he went over to the Saljūqs and joined forces with them against the Ghaznawids. He should not be confused with Tughral Beg the Saljūq. Sir W Haig says that "he does not appear to have been acting, in his rebellion, as an agent of the Saljūqs" on the ground that "his successes appear to have included some victories over the Saljūqs" (C H I, iii, 34) prisoners to Ghaznīn. In 1046 A.C. he was again sent to Bust, but this time he showed signs of rebellion and was therefore defeated and put to flight by an officer sent against him * The same year also witnessed the subjugation of Ghūr by Bāstīgīn, who was entrusted with that work. Since he distinguished himself as a commander in the expedition against Ghūr, he was selected to lead the Imperial forces against the Saljūqs. Success greeted him and he was able to disperse the hordes of his enemy. In 1047 A.C. the Amī of Qusdār rebelled, but when attacked, he fled and sought forgiveness, which was not grudged. The Saljūq menace was still there and now the Sultan decided to end it by conducting the campaign against the Saljūqs in person, but he had a sudden attack of colic in the fort of Siālkot, where he had gone to take possession of the treasure that was there with a view to finance the expedition against the Saljūqs without experiencing any difficulty. When the disease took a serious turn and the pain became acute, he dropped the idea and returned to Ghaznīn, entrusting the campaign against the Saljūqs to his Wazīr, 'Abdur Razzāq. He succumbed to the fatal disease on the 22nd of December, 1049 A.C. He enjoyed a brief but busy reign of about eight years †

* The name of this officer as given by Ferishta is 'Alī bin Khādim Rabī (T F, 1, 46)

† I K, II, xii, 291, 293, and T F, 1, 45-46

On the death of Maudūd his son Abū Ja'far
Mas'ūd, who was then four years
Abu Ja'far of age, was proclaimed king in Masud II accordance with the will of his father and his mother began to exercise the powers of regency. But this arrangement, made by 'Alī bin Khādim Rabī', was set aside by the nobles of Ghaznīn, led by Bastīgīn, who were not consulted in the matter of succession. The successful party deposed the young king and raised his uncle, Abul Hasan 'Alī, to the throne of Ghaznīn.
The minor had a reign of a few days.*

Abul Hasan 'Alī enjoyed a brief reign of two years † At his accession 'Alī bin Abul Hasan 'Alī Khādim Rabī', who had identified himself with the cause of the minor king, collected as much of wealth as he could and fled to Peshawar with a party of nobles and slaves on account of fear. There he reduced the

* The duration of his reign is a subject of controversy. According to Minhāj us Sirāj (T A, 10), it was two months. Hāmidullāh Mīstāfī (T G, 40), says that it extended over two years. Ibn Khaldūn (I K, II, xii, 293) says that it lasted for 5 days. Ferishtā (T F, i, 46) says that Mas'ūd II ruled for five or six days. It is difficult to give the precise duration of his reign, but it can be safely said that it did not exceed a month at the most (See Rāverī's translation of T A, 97, f n 4, T A, 31, and A T, xx).

† Minhāj us Sirāj's statement (T N, 16) that Mas'ūd II and 'Alī exercised joint sovereignty does not seem to be correct, for the arrangement was most unlikely. (See Rāverī's translation of T A, 97, f n 4.)

Afghāns to submission and established his sway over the territory as far as Multān and Sind. The Sultān sent for his brothers, Mardān Shāh and Izad Shāh, and honoured them. He resorted to a lavish distribution of wealth in order to win the good-will of the people, but it served no purpose. His uncle, 'Abdur Rāshid, came to Ghaznīn, deposed him and ascended the throne.*

The first thing that 'Abdur Rāshid † did after ascending the throne was to effect the arrest of Abūl Ḥasan, who had run away at his arrival and to imprison him in a fort. Next he turned his attention towards India. First he won over 'Alī bin Khādim Rābi' to his side and then sent Nūshīgīn to take over the government of Lāhore. He was accompanied by an army of distinguished soldiers. Within a couple of days he recovered Nagarkot or Kangra, which the Hīnāüs had occupied during the recent troubles, and established his authority in the Punjab. Shortly afterwards, the chief, Tughrāl 'the Ingrate', who had been sent to Sīstān to reduce it to submission, revolted and began to mature plans for the conquest of Ghaznīn. The conquest of Sīstān had placed enough of the sinews of war at his disposal, and he boldly advanced with his army and inflicted a defeat on 'Abdur Rashīd and entered Ghaznīn in triumphant procession *

* T. F., i, 46 47, and I. K., II, viii, 293.

† According to Ferishta, Sultān 'Abdur Rāshid was a son of Sultān Mahmud and was confined in a fort between Bust and Isfāran by Maudūd. The same authority further informs us that Maudūd had made a will in support of his succession during his life time. It is, however not explained why he was imprisoned by the same man who had made a will in his favour or why the will was made when he was not on good terms with him (Vide T. F., i, 47).

The victorious rebel crowned himself at Ghaznīn and slaughtered 'Abdur Rashīd as well as all other princes of Mahmūd's family who happened to fall into his hands. He contracted Nikāh with Mas'ūd's daughter and sent sugar-coated compliments to Nūshītīgīn Karkhī, who had set out from Lāhore and reached Peshāwar in obedience to the orders of Sultān 'Abdur Rashīd. While making a reply to his letter, Nūshītīgīn sent secret instructions to Mas'ūd's daughter, asking her to put an end to the life of Tughral. He also sent similar instructions to the adherents of the cause of Mahmūd's family. The result was that their sense of honour and loyalty was touched

* I K, II, vii, 294-95, T F, i, 47 When inquired as to how he entertained the ambition to rule, Tughral calmly made the following reply "At the time that 'Abdur Rashīd was sending me forth to do battle against Alp Arslān and Dāūd, and was giving me my instructions and had placed his hand in mine terror had overcome him to that degree, that I could hear his very bones rattling from the state of trembling he was in. I knew this pusillanimous man was incapable of sovereignty, and the ambition of reigning entered my heart" (T N, 100, and T F, i, 47)

and they all made up their mind to put the usurper to death. On the eventful day of Nauroz, when Sultān Mahmūd had ascended the throne, they actually succeeded in murdering Tughral, who had a reign of only forty days.*

A few days after this event Nūshīgīn arrived Farrukhzad in Ghaznīn. He called together the grandees of Ghaznīn and made a search for the surviving descendants of Subuktigīn. Three princes were found as prisoners in different forts. They were Farrukhzād,† Ibrāhīm and Shujā'. The choice fell on the first-named and he was forthwith raised to the throne and proclaimed king. At his accession in 1052 A.C., Farrukhzād entrusted the administrative machinery of the kingdom to Nūshīgīn, who was decidedly the most devoted votary of the descendants of Mahmūd. Buoyed up with the hopes of retrieving the fallen fortunes of his family by recovering the lost provinces of Ghaznīn, he plunged himself into a life-long struggle with his hereditary enemies, the Saljūqs. Taking advantage of the disturbances at Ghaznīn, Chāqar Beg Dāūd undertook an expedition against Ghaznīn. On hearing of his approach, Nūshītgīn set out with his forces and in a hotly contested battle, which lasted from sunrise till sunset, he dispersed the Saljūqs and won a decisive victory, which immensely enhanced the prestige of the House of Ghaznīn. Next he led an army against Khurāsān, where, in an encounter with the Saljūqs, headed by Kalīsarāq, he defeated them and took their leader and many others prisoners. The progress of the Ghaznawid arms was, however, arrested by the rising genius of Alp Arslān who was sent by his father, Chāqar Beg Dāūd, after the defeat of Kalīsarāq. Arslān won an indecisive victory and then retired. A peace-treaty was then concluded and faithfully observed by the parties. A plot was hatched against Farrukhzād by his slaves, who one day, entered the Hummām where he was and attacked him. The Sultān drew out his sword and defended himself successfully. He put the assailants to the sword but did not long survive the incident. He died of colic in 1059 A.C. after a reign of six years. His Wazirs were Hasan bin Mehrān and Abū Bakr bin Sāleḥ.*

* T G, 403, and T F, 1, 47

† For Farrukhzād, see Cousins of the Ghazni Kings, Nos 97 and 98. Some authorities have omitted the name of this king from the list of the Sultāns of Ghaznīn. He preceded Ibrāhīm and followed 'Abdur Rashīd—a fact which is established by numismatic evidence. The Persian authorities, it may be noted here, are at variance in regard to the list of the Ghaznavid kings and I have, therefore, relied upon numismatic evidence, which is the safest and most reliable course (C O C in B M, 18, 234). According to Khwāndmīr (R S) Sultān Farrukzād was the son of Mas'ud and according to Hamdullah Mastriūsī (T G) he was the son of 'Abdur Rashīd (See T F, 1, 48).

* K. T., v, 2 ff., T. A. in E & D., ii, 276 ff., I. K., II, viii, 297-298 (translator's note), and T. F., i, 47-48

Farrukhzād was succeeded by his brother Ibrāhīm, who was 'a professed devotee', endowed with a rare sense of justice, piety and kindness. The new Sultān renewed the peace-treaty with the Saljūqs and in order to harmonize his relations with them still further, he arranged a marriage between his son, Mas'ūd, and the daughter of Malak Shāh, son of Alp Arslān. After establishing friendly relations with the Saljūqs, Ibrāhīm turned his attention towards India with a view to conquer the hitherto unconquered places. In 1079 A.C. he personally went there and captured the forts of Ajūdhan (Pāk Patan) and Rūpāl and some other places, displaying great wisdom and valour during the campaign. On his return he brought with him a vast amount of booty and a large number of prisoners to Ghaznīn. Ibrāhīm is rightly said to have been a great king. He set in order the machinery of administration which was completely out of gear and 'fully established the authority of the Crown over the recalcitrant tribes'. According to Qāzī Minhāj, "the affairs of the empire of the Great Mahmūd assumed fresh vigour during his reign". As a man of learning, piety and peaceful disposition, he passed most of his time in making copies of the Qur-an and practising the art of penmanship. He was a great lover of learning and a liberal patron of letters. He is said to have been the author of a book called *Dastūr-ul-Wuzarā. On his death,

* The Dastūr-ul-Wuzarā was a "Hand Book of which took place on the 25th of August, 1099 A C,[‡] he left a number of sons and daughters †

Ibrāhīm was succeeded by a man of more Mas'ud III merits and morals. At his accession the new king, 'Alā-ud-Daulah Mas'ūd III, confirmed the servants of the State appointed by his predecessor in their respective posts and positions. He married the sister of Sultān Sanjar and thus ensured the security of his kingdom against the inroads of the Saljūqs. Peace with the Saljūqs enabled him to turn his attention towards India. He appointed his general, Tughātīqīn, as the Sipāh-Salar or Commander of the forces of Lahore. The said general set out, crossed the Ganges and reached a place which no Muslim, except Mahmūd, had yet touched. After raiding a number of places, he returned to Lāhore. While his general was winning victories for him, the Sultān himself revised the Political Science' meant for the guidance of ministers in the art of administration. It is one of the 93 works drawn upon by Ḥawṣī (Vide J H, 67-68, 224)

* E F D, II, 510 J H, 67-68, 224, I K, II, vii, 298 (translitor's note), and T F, I, 49-50

† T G, 404, and T N 21 Ferishta (T F, I, 49) and Nizam ud Din Ahmad (T A, 17) give 481 A H as well as 492 A H as the dates of Sultan Ibrāhīm's death, but do not say which of the two dates is correct. Numismatic evidence testifies to the correctness of the second, i.e. 492 A H—1099 A C (Vide J R A S, ix, 361-64).

‡ Another important event of his reign was the appointment of a Ghaznavid officer, Husun bin Sām as governor of Ghūr—a fact which incidentally shows laws and crystallized them into a consistent code. He proved himself a good administrator and enjoyed a peaceful reign of sixteen years, during a major part of which his Court resided at Lāhore *

Mas'ūd III died in 1115 A C and was succeeded by his son, Kamāl-ud-Sherzad and Arslan Shah Daulah Sherzād† who had not yet completed the first anniversary of his reign when he was deposed and killed by his brother, Arslān Shāh Abul Mulūk‡ who

that the principality of Ghūr was still under the sway of the Ghaznawids

* T F , i, 49, I K , II, xii, 298-99 (Tr's note)

† Some historians have omitted the name of this king from the list of the Ghaznawid Sultāns There is no justification for it He is mentioned by Hamdullah Mastaufī (T G), Ferishta (T F , i, 49) and Khwāndmir (E & D , ix, 206) The chronological chain of the Ghaznawid kings loses one of its links if his name is excluded from it

‡ In the original Persian text this word is written as “ابو علیک” In E & D , (ii, 279) Sir Henry Elliot has converted it into 'Abdul Malik, in his translation of T N (p 107, note), Raverty has changed it into 'Abdul Mulūk, and in C H I , (Vol iii, p 35), Sir W Haig has written it as 'Abdul Malik “ابو علیک” is sheer nonsense It must therefore be a miswriting of some other word. While trying to correct it, Raverty and Haig have made a fundamental mistake in converting Abū into 'Abd Abū of the original text is quite correct It is only “الملوك” that is wrong Raverty's conjectural restoration of the word is wrong for the simple reason that no king would also threw into prison all of his other brothers, except Bahrām Shāh who, when escaped, went to Sultān Sanjar and invoked his help * Sanjar was at that time in charge of Khurāsān as a viceroy of his brother, Muhammad Sultān bin Malak Shāh When Arslān Shāh learnt of all this, he wrote a letter to Sultān Sanjar about Bahrām Shāh and tried to appease him, but failed to achieve his object Sanjar took up the cause of Bahrām and proceeded against Ghaznīn On hearing this, Arslān Shāh sent a messenger to Muhammad Sultān and requested him to dissuade his brother from prosecuting his plan When this also led to nothing useful, Arslān Shāh sent his mother, the Saljūqian princess, with 200,000 dīnārs and other valuable presents to her brother, Sultān Sanjar, to pacify him The like to style himself 'Abdul Mūlūk or "Servant of Kings" Sir W Haig's conjecture lacks all authority and must be dismissed as beside the mark Elliot's conjecture—that the word is 'Abul Mālik' is a good shot, near the mark but not exactly in the bull's eye Mīrzā Muhammad Qazvīnī has it as 'Abul Mūlūk' (J R A S , 1905, 720) Professor Hodivala also is in its favour (S I - V H , 198) It appears that the middle r of "ابالملوک" has been left out by the scribe Abul Mūlūk or "Father of Kings" is therefore the most sensible restoration of Arslān's title

* The exact date of Sultān Arslān's accession is given in no work, but it is preserved in a qasida of Mas'ud-i-Sa'd-i-Salmān, for which see Mīrzā Muhammad Qazvīnī in J R A S , (1905, p 705), where it is given as the 6th of Shawwāl, 511 A H , which corresponds to the 23rd February, 1116 A C

lady, who was so deeply incensed by the murders of her sons and the insult to which he had subjected her, poured forth the long-pent-up grievances before her brother and thus aggravated the crisis * Sultān Sanjar advanced with his forces and Arslān Shāh also came out to receive him in the battle-field In the battle that was fought, Sanjar won a decisive victory and Arslān Shāh fled towards India After a stay of 40 days in Ghaznīn, Sanjar went back, leaving Bahrām in possession of Ghaznīn On hearing of his departure from Ghaznīn, Arslān Shāh raised an army in India and proceeded towards it On his arrival Bahrām withdrew to the fort of Bāmiān and remained there till he was restored to the throne by Sanjar Arslān Shāh was arrested and made over to Bahrām Shāh who put him to death Thus came to an end a most troubled reign of about three years (1115—18 A C)†

* Bahrām is said to have asked his step mother, the Saljuqian princess, to dance before him and that is supposed to have drawn down upon him the wrath of her brother, Sultān Sanjar (M I)

† K T, v, 179, T F, i, 49 50, and I K, II, xii, 299-300 (Tr's note) The date of Arslān's death as given by Mīnhāj-us-Sirāj is 511 (T N) and as given by Ibn-ul-Asīr is 512 A H (K T, v 179) The difference is due to the fact that Mīnhāj-us-Sirāj has left out Sherzād, who followed Mas'ūd III and preceded Arslān and whose reign lasted for some months Ibn-ul-Asīr's evidence is, therefore, to be preferred

Since Bahrām owed his success to the support of the Saljūqs, the influence of Bahram Shah the latter in the governmental affairs of Ghaznīn was bound to increase by leaps and bounds Nevertheless, the relations between them and the Sultan of Ghaznīn continued to be harmonious But for the bitter hostilities of the Māhks of Ghūr, in which he was constantly involved and to which we shall presently revert, Bahrām's reign would have been glorious.

Soon after ascending the throne, Bahrām turned his attention towards the Indian Province, which was then held by Bahlīm, an officer appointed by Arslān Shah He took an army against the said officer, defeated him and took him to Ghaznīn as a prisoner, but restored him to his previous dignity and sent him again to India some time later In his absence the same officer conquered Nagaur (in Swālik), left his family there and then launched upon a career of conquests Having collected a large army, he raided a number of places and possessed himself of immense wealth The wealth thus amassed widened the horizon of his ambitions and he now aspired for the sovereignty of an independent kingdom Bahrām again marched against him in person and in a battle that was fought the rebellious governor disappeared and was seen no more * After appointing Sālār Husain son of

* According to Mīnhīj us Sirāj (T. V. in E & D, ii, 280), Bahlīm and his ten sons fell into a quagmire on the Ibrāhīm 'Alwī as the Sipāh-Salar of the Indian Province and introducing other necessary changes, the Sultān returned to Ghaznīn.*

We may now revert to the struggle between the Ghaznawids and the Ghūrids for political supremacy in Afghānistān. The Ghūrids, it should be recalled, had fought faithfully under the banner of Sultān Mamūd and established their reputation as first-rate warriors. But when the sceptre passed into the hands of mere mediocres, they became lukewarm, even cold, in their allegiance to the Ghaznawid Sultān and treated him with scant courtesy†. The matters became more day of the battle [See Dowson's note (Ibid.) and S I-M H, 198-99] Dowson says that there are some unintelligible words in the original. The words in question are 'دَر, مَدْنَى نُورِي' According to Richardson's Dictionary, "در" or "مدنا" means "a ditch, a marsh, a place where water stagnates". Professor Hodivala's suggestion that "the word 'نوری'" (recte "نوری" Bahrūm) is a conjectural or variant reading, which the copyist had found transcribed in the margin and inserted or transferred by error into the text" seems to be quite correct (S I-M H, 198-99) Ferishta substitutes the synonymous word "نَحْمَان" (T F, i, 50), which confirms the conclusion of the learned Professor. According to Ferishta (Ibid.), two and not ten sons shared Bahlīm's fate. He is followed by Sir W Haig (C H I, iii, 35).

* T F, i, 50, I K, II, xii, 300 (Tr's note)

† The Ghūrids fully availed themselves of the struggle between the Ghaznawids and the Saljuqs and, husbanded their resources for asserting their own supremacy serious when a Sūrī Prince, Qutb-ud-Dīn Muhammad of Ghūr, was put to death under the instructions of Bahrām*. To retaliate the murder of the deceased, his brother, Saif-ud-Dīn, attacked Ghaznīn, defeated Bahrām and drove him into India. After the conquest of Ghaznīn Saif-ud-Dīn sent his brother, 'Alā-ud-Dīn, to Ghūr and himself settled down in Ghaznīn along with his family. The sympathies of the people of Ghaznīn were, however, with Bahrām and they kept him in close touch with the affairs at the Imperial Capital †. Availing himself of the sympathies of the people and of the state of affairs at Ghaznīn, Bahrām marched out from Kirmān ‡ at the head of an army, defeated Saif-ud-Dīn in a pitched battle and took him prisoner. Saif-ud-Dīn was mounted on a lean old cow and paraded through the bazars of Ghaznīn and then tortured to death. When 'Alā-ud-Dīn heard of the fate of his brother, he vowed to fall upon the Sultān of Ghaznīn and advanced with the best of his forces. He defeated Bahrām in three successive battles and put him to flight. When defeated and disappointed, Bahrām fled towards

* Annoyed with his brother, Qutb ud-Dīn Muhammad of Ghūr fled to Ghaznīn and found refuge with Bahrām, who also married one of his daughters to him. Later, he was suspected of treason and poisoned to death (T F, 1, 50).

† T F, 1, 50 51

‡ This was a town situated between Ghaznīn and India and should not be confused with its more famous namesake (T F, 1, 50).

India. There he raised a large force and again attacked Ghaznīn and occupied it. He, however, found his capital in quite a different condition, for after his victory 'Alā-ud-Dīn had given it to plunder for seven days, during which a number of its finest buildings and 'exquisite memorials of the greatness and splendour' of Mahmūd were destroyed and most of its inhabitants killed.^{*} This act of 'Alā-ud-Dīn earned for him the title of Jahānsuz or 'World Burner'. Bahrām died sometime later. †

Bahrām was a most remarkable patron of Progress of letters and a great friend of the learned learning and education. Among many others, Sayyad Hasan Ghaznawī and Shaikh Nizāmī flourished at his Court and enjoyed his patronage. The latter dedicated his book entitled Makhsan-i-Asrār to the Imperial patron. Numerous foreign works were also translated into Persian under his instructions. Among the most important translated versions may be mentioned the Kahila wa Damna, which was renamed Antar-i-Suhaili, which is still so popular with the people of India and outside. The Sultan was also interested in the wide-spread diffusion of education. He opened a number of *maktab*s and madrasahs for the purpose, and as a natural result, education made mighty strides during his reign *

* Even the tombs of the Ghaznawid princes, save those of Mahmūd, Mas'ud I and Ibrāhīm were not spared. The remains of the princes were torn from their graves and burnt (M I).

† There are several discrepancies about the date of Bahrām's death. According to Ferishta (T F, 1, 52), he died in 1152 A C., i.e before the burning of Ghaznīn by 'Alā-ud-Dīn Jahānsuz. If this account be accepted as correct, the pillage of Ghaznīn took place during the reign of Khusrāu Shāh. I have followed Minhāj us-Sirāj (T N), which is a much earlier work.

Khusrav Shah, the son and successor of Bahrām Shah, was unfit to cope successfully with the onerous situation that confronted him at his accession. When, after the conquest of Khurāsān and the defeat of Sultan Sanjar,† the Ghuzz Turkomāns attacked Ghaznīn, he took to flight and found shelter in India, where he died at Lāhore in 1160 A.C.‡ Of the extensive empire of Sultan Mahmūd, the Punjab was all that remained in the hands of his descendants. Ghaznīn remained in possession of the Ghuzz Turkomāns for ten years and then it passed into the hands of the princes of Ghūr.

* T F, i, 50

† Sultan Sanjar died in the hands of the Ghuzz Turkomāns in 1157 A.C. (C H I, iii, 37)

‡ According to Ferishta, the pillage of Ghaznīn took place during his reign (T F, i, 52). In view of the fact that there is a great confusion about the regnal dates of the Ghaznavid princes, it is very difficult to locate events in correct serial order.

India. There he raised a large force and again attacked Ghaznīn and occupied it. He, however, found his capital in quite a different condition, for after his victory 'Alā-ud-Dīn had given it to plunder for seven days, during which a number of its finest buildings and 'exquisite memorials of the greatness and splendour' of Mahmūd were destroyed and most of its inhabitants killed.* This act of 'Alā-ud-Dīn earned for him the title of Jahānsuz or 'World Burner'. Bahrām died sometime later.†

Bahrām was a most remarkable patron of letters and a great friend of the learned. Among many others, Sayyad Hasan Ghaznawī and Shaikh Nizāmī flourished at his Court and enjoyed his patronage. The latter dedicated his book entitled Makhzan-i-Asrar to the Imperial patron. Numerous foreign works were also translated into Persian under his instructions. Among the most important translated versions may be mentioned the Kalila wa Damna, which was renamed Amar-i-Sulṭanī, which is still so popular with the people of India and outside. The Sultan was also interested in the wide spread diffusion of education. He opened a number of maktabs and madrasas for the purpose, and as a natural result, education made mighty strides during his reign.*

* Even the tombs of the Ghaznawid princes, save those of Mahmūd, Mas'ud I and Ibrāhīm were not spared. The remains of the princes were torn from their graves and burnt (M I)

† There are several discrepancies about the date of Bahrām's death. According to Ferishta (T F, 1, 52), he died in 1152 A. C., i.e before the burning of Ghaznīn by 'Alā-ud-Dīn Jahānsuz. If this account be accepted as correct, the pillage of Ghaznīn took place during the reign of Khusrau Shāh. I have followed Mīnhāj us-Sirāj (T N), which is a much earlier work.

Khusrau Shāh, the son and successor of Khusrau Shāh, was unfit to cope successfully with the onerous situation that confronted him at his accession. When after the conquest of Khurāsān and the defeat of Sultan Sanjar, the Ghuzz Turkomans invaded Ghaznī, he took to flight and found shelter in India, where he died at Lahore in 1160 A.C.‡ Of the extensive empire of Sultan Mahomed, the Punjab was all that remained in the hands of his descendants. Ghaznī remained in possession of the Ghuzz Turkomans for ten years and then it passed into the hands of the princes of Ghur.

* T I, i, 57

† Sultan Sanjar died in the hands of the Ghuzz Turkomans 1157 A.C. (C H I, iii, 37)

‡ According to Leichter, the pillage of Ghaznī took place during his reign (T I, i, 52). In view of the fact that there is a great confusion about the regnal dates of the Ghuravid ruler, it is very difficult to locate events in exact calendar.

Khusrau Shāh was succeeded by his son, Khusrau Malik, who ruled for about 27 years, with his capital at Lāhore. He established his authority over all those places which formed part of the Indian Province under Sultan Ibrāhīm and Sultan Bahrām Shāh. No longer content with the conquest of Ghaznīn, Shahāb-ud-Dīn Muhammad Ghūrī, brother of Sultan Ghiyās-ud-Dīn of Ghūr, conquered Peshāwar, Afghānistān, Multān and Sind and then contemplated the conquest of India. He repeatedly attacked India and compelled Khusrau Malik to sue for peace and to offer his son as a hostage till the fulfilment of the terms of the peace-treaty. Later, Khusrau Malik was taken prisoner by means of a ruse and killed in 1191 A.C.* With him ended the House of Ghaznīn and then the sovereignty of Hindūstān, in addition to that of Ghaznīn and its dependencies, passed into the hands of the Ghūrid Chiefs.

* Briefly stated, the ruse, as described by Ferishta, is as follows —

Muīz-ud-Dīn (Shahāb-ud-Dīn Muhammad of Ghūr) informed Khusrau that he wished to cultivate friendly relations with him, and as a proof of his sincerity, he sent back the prince kept as a hostage, to his father with a very splended escort. Khusrau advanced a part of the way to meet his son, when all of a sudden he was surrounded by the Ghūrid forces at night. In the morning, when he woke up, he found himself a prisoner. Thus Muīz-ud-Dīn entered Lāhore in triumphant procession without shedding a drop of blood (T.F., i, 52).

CHAPTER V

THE GHANZIWID GOVERNMENT

The Ghaznawids sprung into power and Introductory ruled over a vast empire for over two centuries. During this period some of them, particularly Mahmud, made an enduring impress on the history of their times.
In the preceding pages we have dealt with their military achievements and have also had occasional glimpses of their contributions to the arts of peace. Here it is proposed to deal with the administrative side of their rule, to refer to the progress of arts and sciences under their patronage and to sum up their achievements.

In the sphere of administration the Ghazna-wids were guided by the precedents
The nature of of the Khilfahs of Baghdad and the Government Samānid rulers of Bukhārā. Far from theocracy, which was contemplated by the Qur'an and put into practice by the Prophet of Islam, the Muslim Government had become an absolute monarchy.* The Sultan was a full-

* It may be pointed out here that the State had drifted far from the high ideal set forth by the Qur'an. It did, however, try to follow the laws of the Sunnat so long as they did not collide or come in conflict with those of its own. This is because most of the later Muslim kings were interested more in their own aggrandizement than in the glorification of Islam.

fledged autocrat with unlimited powers*. He could nominate his own successor and do whatever he liked, subject, of course, to such limitations as were occasioned by fear of rebellions and revolts†. He was Zullullah or "the Shadow of God" on Earth and hence the highest executive, legislative, judicial and military authority, responsible to no earthly power for his actions. He exercised general supervision over the working of the administrative machinery, regulated foreign policy, dictated all important diplomatic correspondence and made all important appointments. He was the Commander-in-Chief of his army. He led almost all his expeditions in person or directed them from his capital. In serious situations he convened a council of high officials of the State and consulted them, but he was not bound by their decision. The council was thus a mere deliberative or consultative body ‡.

The Ghaznawid Government undertook to Functions— protect the country from external invasions, to regulate foreign policy,

* For the powers and privileges of a Muslim king, see T M, 108-10, T Y, 5, and S N, 110. See also S C A M R I, 8-11.

† For the limitations of a Muslim king, see J R A S B (1935), i, 128-29, and S C A M R I, 11-15.

‡ T M, 266, S N, 84. Nizāmī al 'Arūzī compares a king with a child and says that the first and foremost condition of service under him is to speak according to his wishes (C M).

to maintain law and order, to suppress crime and to encourage public morality, to ensure the security of the life and property of the people, to administer justice and to enforce private contracts. In addition to these constituent functions, the Ghaznawid Government also performed such ministerial duties as fixing of coinage, maintenance and protection of roads and highways, construction of public works of utility, promotion of education, encouragement of arts and literature and administration of famine relief *

Tolerance is the sine quo non of the success and stability of a State and no ruler, however mighty, can afford to do without it if he aspires to perpetuate his rule. The Ghaznawid rulers fully understood and appreciated this point and followed a policy of universal toleration within their dominions. We have had occasions to refer to the religious policy of Sultan Mahmūd and his successors and shown that it was characterized by toleration in the widest sense of the word †. The Zimmis (non Muslims) enjoyed full freedom of worship and liberty of conscience. The destruction of temples outside the Ghaznawid Empire was not the result of religious zeal or fanaticism but of dire political necessity and need for money—for financing military schemes successfully. If the Ghaznawid Sultans had aimed at the spread of

* Vide infra

† See supra, pp 103-4, 202 3

Islam at the point of the sword, as alleged by the critics, they would not have tolerated the existence of idols and temples in their capital * The employment of Hindus in highly responsible posts of the State without any restrictions of rank, race or religion amply brings out their broad-mindedness and testifies to their catholicity of mind They consistently followed the policy of toleration in their kingdom and we do not come across a single instance when a Zimmi was subjected to inequitable treatment on account of his religion The Hindus formed an important part of the Ghaznawid armies and occupied such important posts as those of commanders They also held high positions in the administrative system They were taken into confidence and entrusted with responsible tasks †

In the absence of a well-defined and recog-

Absence of the Law of Succession
nized law, governing the succession to the throne, rival claims often come in conflict and the history of the Ghaznawids teems with instances to illustrate this rule On his death Alptigin was succeeded by his son, Is-haq, who was driven out but restored by the Samanid overlord On his death the adherents of Alptigin elected one of their chiefs, called Bilkatigin, as their king. Piratigin (Piri), who followed him, was deposed in favour of Subuktigin, another chief, who was

* Risālat-ul-Ghufrān, by Al-Ma'arrī, p 153

† M G , 163 64, C H I , m, 88 89, H I , 292-93,
P P M T , 45-46

descendants of Mahmūd * It was therefore easy for an able and ambitious man to make a bid for the throne, but none dared come out. After a thorough search, two or three princes of Mahmūd's family were found alive and one of them was immediately enthroned. Two important inferences can be drawn from the above discussion. Unfitness to command and rule was a positive disqualification and nothing could override the ability to rule till the time of Subuktigīn. After Mahmūd, however, descent became an all-important claim which could not be over-ridden by any such qualifications as ability to rule or power of the sword. Mahmūd's prestige was responsible for keeping the crown reserved for his descendants and the struggle for succession was strictly confined to their family-circle. It was not, however, settled as to which of the sons or brothers of the late king had the best claim. One who possessed the purse and commanded the confidence of the people had, of course, the best chances to succeed. A minor's chances were few and far between, and hence with one solitary exception no minor occupied the throne of Ghaznīn †.

The Central Government The Ghaznawid system of administration was modelled on that of Baghdād and Bukhārā ‡. For purposes of effective control and efficient administration the Ghaznawid Empire was divided into a number of provinces, each of which was placed in charge of a trusted officer. Every province was sub-divided into a number of smaller units corresponding to our modern districts. The Sultān was the highest authority, as already remarked, and he had under him a set of officers who held the portfolios of different departments of the State. The principal departments were (1) Diwān-i-Wizārat, (2) Diwān-i-'Arz, (3) Diwān-i-Risālat, (4) Diwān-i-Sughl-i-Ishrāf-i-Mamlukat, (5) Diwān-i-Wikālat (6) Diwān-i-Mazālim, (7) Diwān-i-Muhtasib, (8) Diwān-i-Auqāf, (9) Diwān-i-Mu'mlikat-i-Khas and (10) Diwān-i-Barid *. A brief description of each of these departments and its functions is attempted in the following pages.

* See supra, p. 223

† See supra, p. 221. See also S A M A, 12-14

‡ Ghaznīn was formerly a dependency of Bukhārā.

The Diwān-i-Wizārat or the Finance Department was under the direct control of the Wazīr who was the highest official of the State, holding a place second only to the throne. The Wazīr was expected to be a most experienced and qualified man, possessing a fertile brain, a facile pen and

As such, it was governed as a part of the Sāmānid Empire according to the Sāmānid system of administration. When Sultān Mahmūd mounted the throne and threw off the Sāmānid yoke, he continued the same system of administration without introducing any appreciable changes. The same system was followed by his successors.

* Abū Bakr Muhammād b. Ja'far Narshakhi has given a list of some of these Diwāns in his Tārikh-i-Bukhāra, p. 24. (Schefer's edition) ability to handle serious situations successfully. He assisted the Sultān in the discharge of his duties and controlled the entire machinery of government. In the absence of the Sultān he acted as his deputy and supervised all the departments of the State. His was the court of first instance in matters relating to fiscal policy. He occupied a most uncertain position. He was a buffer between the Sultān and his subjects, exposed to the whims and caprices of the former and the hatred and jealousy of the latter.*

The Diwān-i-'Arz† or the Military Department was in charge of an officer called 'Arz', who was next

* C M , T II , 181, 297, M G , 132 ff , S A M A , 161 ff

Sultān Mahmūd introduced the institution of Wizārat in the administrative system of Ghaznīn and it gained immense power and prestige under his successors. The election by the elite of the officials of a panel from which the Sultān was to select one as his Wazir was indeed a most useful contribution to the system of government that was then in vogue. The importance of the method of appointing Wazir, as introduced by Mahmūd and followed by his successors, has not received the appreciation it deserves. No Muslim or Hindu ruler of India, nor even the Great Mughals, ever thought of adopting such a wise course of action. On the other hand, they would have regarded it as an encroachment on their prerogatives. It may be pointed out here that the Wazirs of the Ghaznavids were men of extraordinary ability, experience and education. They enjoyed wide powers and were freely entrusted with the work of government in their absence necessitated by military expeditions.

† The 'Shughil i-'Arz' is wrongly translated by Elliot as only to the Wasir in point of importance. The 'Ariz was the adviser of the Sultan in military matters. His principal peace time duties were to maintain the army in a high state of efficiency and to look after the comfort and convenience of soldiers. He kept a regular muster-roll of all soldiers, showing losses due to illness, retirement or war.* During the travels and tours of the Sultan he had to see that the royal camp was properly supplied with provisions, water, fodder, etc.† In war times he acted as Quarter Master General of the army, provided all possible facilities to soldiers at halting stations, and after victory he supervised the collection of booty which was distributed in the presence of the Sultan. He had an assistant called Nazib-'Ariz, who helped him in the discharge of his duties.‡

While we are still about the Dīwan-i-'Ariz a reference may appropriately be made to the army of the Ghaznavids and the military organization under them. The army consisted of infantry, cavalry, the royal

* the business of reporting matters (E & D, II, 73)

† A copy of the muster roll was kept in the office of the Dīwan-i-Risālat for ready reference (T V, 332).

‡ Traders frequently accompanied the armies and catered for the soldiers just as Bānias do the Indian armies in these days (See S A, 91).

‡ T V, 100, 329 30, 332, 532, 625, and M G, 137-38

body-guard * and elephants † In, the absence of statistics it is not possible to give the exact strength of the Ghaznawid army. At one time it was fifty-four thousand strong "besides garrisons at the outposts of the Empire" Dr M Nazim has roughly estimated the number at 100 thousand,‡ but in times of war it must have been swelled enormously by volunteers called Ghazis or 'holy warriors' and the contingents furnished by provincial governments The Ghaznawid army was mainly recruited from Transoxiana, but it also included Arabs, Afghans, Dailamites, Khurāsānids, Ghūrids and Indians. The presence of soldiers of various nationalities served as an effective safeguard, against the possibility of a combination against the Sultān and also fostered a spirit of emulation among them § Highly organized in the times of Sultān Mahmūd, the Ghaznawid army deterio-

* The body-guard of the Sultān consisted principally of slaves who were more dependable than all others because they depended wholly on the Sultān They had their separate commanders and administrative officers They were under the direct supervision of the Sultān Their banner bore the distinctive device of 'a lion and spears' (T M , 329, 488)

† Almost all the elephants had been captured in Indian wars or received in tribute from Indian Princes Their drivers were mostly Hindus and their commander was called Muqaddam-i-Pilbānān Baīhaqī mentions the price of an elephant as 100,000 dirhams (T M , 29, 488, 709).

‡ M G , 140 See also T M , 846

§ S N , 92, and Qābūs Nāma, 176

rated a great deal and became demoralized under Mas'ud and his successors

The Commander of the troops of Khurāsān was the highest military authority, second to the Sultan. Every province had its own Sipah Salar or Commander of local troops and an 'Aris whose duties were similar to those of his prototype of the Central Government. Each Provincial Commander had under him a number of Hajibs, each commanding a Jaish or an army. Below the rank of Hajib was that of Sarhang, who was the commander of 500 horse. The officer next in rank to him was called Oaid who commanded a Khail, consisting of 100 horse. The lowest rank in the army was that of the Khail-tash who was probably a commander of 10 horse.* All soldiers were expected to make their own commissariat arrangements. Each army was provided with a separate armoury and a magazine, and arms were supplied to soldiers just before the battle †

The portfolio of the Diwan-i-Risālat or the Correspondence Department was held by an officer of high literary attainments, experience, ability and

* No contemporary chronicler has given a list of the grades enumerated above. They have been taken from different accounts and are based on casual references (V G, 141)

† T M, 6, 132, 145, 325, 328-30, 332, 421, 423, 616,

tact * The duties of the Sāhib-i-Dīwān-i-Risālat or the Head of the Correspondence Department were multifarious He wrote the letters of the Sultān to the Khalīfa of Baghdād, to foreign powers, to provincial governors and other high officials of the State. Important diplomatic correspondence was dictated by the Sultān himself and the Sāhib-i-Dīwān-i-Risālat deciphered the reports received from the Mushrifs and the Sāhib-i-Barids and submitted them to the Sultān † He had under him a large staff of officers, called Dabirs who were paid handsome salaries Service was graded and vacancies were filled strictly on the basis of seniority and efficiency The office hours were from about 9 a m to about 3 p m Tuesday and Friday were observed as holidays, when one clerk was put on duty to deal with important correspondence and expedite the dispatch of urgent letters A clerk from this department always remained in attendance on the Sultān during his journeys and travels ‡

629, 808, 818,, K T , ix, 241, and M G , 241-42

* He was expected to be a man of mature age and ripe experience Abul Fazl Baihaqī was regarded as too young to fill that post at the age of 45 (T M , 753)

† "Before proceeding to his post, every important officer was supplied with a code of language by the Sāhib-i-Dīwān-i-Risālat or the Head of the Correspondence Department." (T M , 541, 821)

‡ T. M , 166, 181, 191, 297, 581

The Diwan-i-Shughl-i-Ishraf-i-Mamlukat *

—, Shughl-i-Ishraf-i-Mamlukat or the Secret Intelligence Department was in charge of a separate officer who had under him a number of officers called Mushris, who were posted in different parts of the Empire and whose duty was to watch the movements of Government officials all over the Empire and to submit secret information about their doings to the Sahib-i-Shughl-i-Ishraf-i Mamlukat or the Head of the Correspondence Department. The most trusted and confidential servants and slaves of important officers and princes were employed by this department to spy the acts and actions of their masters †. The Mushrifjan-i-Dargah or the Mushris attached to the Court of the Sultan watched the movements of ministers, courtiers

* The translation of the term 'Shughl-i Ishraf-i Mamlukat' in E & D, n, 74 is 'the duty of controlling the financial affairs' and the term 'Mushrif' is translated as "an accountant". The dictionary meaning of the word 'Ishraf' is observation from an eminence. The department (Diwan-i-Ishraf-i Mamlukat) was so called because its business was to keep a sharp watch on the conduct of all important persons and foreign princes. While referring to the Ghaznawid system of secret intelligence or espionage in connection with the arrest and imprisonment of Amir iqāq (Indian Governor), Baihāqī uses the terms حاسوسان و مشهداں as synonymous expressions (Vide T M, 154, 328). Dr R P Tripathi has followed Dowson and repeated the error (S A V A, 211).

† According to Baihāqī, the spies of Sultan Mahmud were so expert that they counted the very breaths of the Khans of Turkistān. (T M, 846)

and princes and kept the Head of the Department informed of their activities * Princes had their own spies among the confidential servants of the Sultān and they kept them in close contact with the Court of their father Thus it was that they outwitted their father in many cases The importance of the officers of this department cannot be exaggerated They could make and mar careers by submitting favourable and adverse reports They were therefore appointed by the Sultān himself in consultation with the Head of the Department and paid lucrative salaries so that they might not yield to the temptations of money, etc † ✓

The Sahib-i-Diwan-i-Wikālat was what may be called in modern terminology the Comptroller of the Household The contemporary chroniclers throw very little light on this department and its officers This is obviously because the nature of the duties of the Sahib-i-Diwan-i-Wikālat and his subordinates did not bring them in contact with the King, the Court and the Courtiers The Head of the Department was sometimes called Wakīl His principal duties were to supervise the Royal Kitchen, the Royal Stables and the personnel attached to the Royal Palace. He was in charge of the personal treasury of the Sultān and it was also his duty to distribute rations and to disburse pay among the personal servants of the Sultān *

* According to Nizām-ul-Mulk, the principal qualifications of Mushrif were honesty and sound judgment (S N , 57)

† T M , 135-38, 164-65, 331, 493, 522, 609, 812, S N , 57, 68, and M G , 144-45

The Diwān-i-Masālim† was what may now be called a Tribunal of Justice. The Sultān himself was a fountain of justice and his was the highest court of appeal. He held his court daily and dealt out justice and redressed the wrongs done to the oppressed ‡. He delegated his powers to Pro-

* It was essential for the Head of this department to possess unimpeachable character and integrity.

† This department was so called because it dealt with the subject of مظلوم or oppression and sought to redress the wrongs done to the oppressed.

‡ Referring to the court of justice held by Sultān Mas'ūd, Baihaqī says "جَنَاحُكَلْمَانِيَّةٍ - مُسْتَقْبَلٌ - مُسْتَقْبَلٌ" (The Amīr dealt with oppression, i.e. he held a court of justice, and heard the complaints of the oppressed persons, and it was a most eventful day). In E & D the extract is translated as "The Amīr was very severe and the day passed in great pomp and splendour" (E & D, ii, 73) Dowson has translated the extract without reference to the text and hence made a mess of the whole thing. In the preceding page Baihaqī has said that the Wazīr has ordered all مظلوم (oppressed persons or complainants) to be called (T M, 181). مُسْتَقْبَل is also referred to as a court of justice. Gardīzī says that soon after his accession Mas'ūd sat in (held) a court of justice (مُسْتَقْبَل شَفَاعَة), heard their complaints and dealt out justice (Z A, 95) Speaking of Sultān Ibrāhīm of Ghaznī also, he uses punished * The system of administering justice was quite sound and simple, being based on the laws of the Shariyat. On the whole, it worked well and was free from such formalities as a litigant in modern times has to observe. Punishments meted out to offenders were severe but they acted as effective deterrents and were quite suited to those stormy times.

The Diwan-i-Muhtasib was concerned with the morals and manners of the —, Muhtasib people. The religious beliefs of Muslim subjects of the Sultān were also ascertained by this department and those found guilty of 'heresy' and moral delinquency were punished. The adherents of the 'Bātini' and 'Carmathian' creeds were rigorously persecuted everywhere in the Empire during the reign of Sultān Mahmūd "they were captured, imprisoned and, if they did not recant, were sometime brutally murdered and burnt" and their literature was ruthlessly destroyed †

The Diwan-i-Auqaf was in charge of a separate officer who supervised social —, Auqaf activities of the people and managed religious endowments and such institutions as *maktab*s and *madrasah*s, mosques and monasteries ‡

* S N, 38, 40, 54, 65, 77, T M, 40, 181, 246

† T M, 664, K T, ix, 264, V G., 160

‡ T M, 308

The Diwān-i-Mumlikat-i-Khās was another department of the State. As to the rôle of this department and the duties of its head, the contemporary accounts afford little clue. From the designation of the officer in charge of this department (Sāhib-i-Diwān-i-Mumlikat-i-Khās) it appears that he was entrusted with the management of Crown-lands or royal domain, corresponding to the Diwān-i-Khalisa of the Mughal Period *

Every province had its own Sāhib-i-Barid† or Post Master General. He was the official news-writer and it was his duty to keep the Sultān informed of all that took place in the province where he was posted. He submitted reports in a cipher previously arranged with the Sāhib-i-Diwan-i-Risālat. Reports were conveyed through the agency of Askudars or mounted couriers. Important communications were sent through special messengers. The system worked well, but at times it was set at naught by the refractory governors who prevailed upon the Sāhib-i-Barids either by

* See S A M A, 211-12

† At first the word 'Barid' was used for the post-mule, then for the courier who rode the post mule and finally for the distance between two postal stations. The word is perhaps derived from the Persian word بُرید or 'cut' which was applied to the mules that had their tails cut or docked (See S I M H, 153)

bribes or by force to send favourable reports about them to the Central Government. Often the couriers were waylaid, searched and dispossessed of the implicating papers. The Sahib-i-Barid therefore sent his couriers in the guise of merchants, mendicants and travellers, who carried official papers in the handles of implements kept hollow for the purpose or in the soles of their shoes, etc. *

There was yet another officer called Khasan Khāsan (treasurer). He was in charge of the Government Treasury. He is only rarely referred to in the contemporary chronicles, where too he does not find place among the high officials of the State. It may therefore be inferred that he did not enjoy a very high status or rank †.

The Provincial Government was based on the model of the Central Government and had three distinct branches of administration, viz civil, judicial and military. The highest civil officer in a province was called Sahib-i-Dewan. He was entrusted with the collection of the revenue due to the State and was directly responsible to the Wāsir. He had under him a staff of subordinate officers such as 'Amils who collected the revenue from the sub-division in their charge* The chief military officer was the Sipāh Salar or the commander of the provincial army. The Sāhib-i-Diwān and the Sipāh Salar worked independently of each other, but in some cases when it was considered desirable they worked together and co-operated with each other. The highest judicial officer of a province was the Qazi-ul-Quzzat, who, in addition to his duties as a judge, supervised the judiciary of the province where he was stationed, and saw that the Qazis under him discharged their duties honestly and efficiently.†

* T. II, 27, 139, 165-66, 425, 493-94, 522-23, 541, 627, 821, S. N., 57-58, 65, 68

† S A M A , 212.

How towns were administered is a question that confronts us now Unfortunately, information on this subject Administra- is scanty and that too lies scattered tion of cities over numerous accounts Every town had a fort to protect it from an external attack The commander of the fort was called Kotwāl. He was the highest military officer of the locality The principal civil officer of a town was Muhtasib‡ who had a number of duties to perform He had to see that law was respected and peace was not disturbed, that food-stuffs were not adulterated and weights and measures were not tampered with, that trade was

* The revenue system has been dealt with separately
Vide infra, pp 260 ff

† S N, 18, 77-78, 149 50, T M, 246, 327, 352, 447, 488, 496, 559

‡ His other designation was Shihna (M G, 150)

protected and artisans were not molested, and that the Muslim code of morality was faithfully followed by the Muslim population. Offenders were arrested and sent to the Amir-i-Haras (Chief Jailor) who kept them in the lock up till they were summoned to stand their trial in the court of the Qazis. Each town had a paid Khatib who acted as *Pesh-Imām and read the Khutba in the name of the Sultan. Municipal administration as we understand it, was not known but there is ample evidence on record to show that the notables of towns were consulted in all matters of importance relating to towns. The religious and educational endowments were administered by a separate office called Ishraf-i-Auqaf and the Sahib-i-Ishraf-i-Auqaf looked to the collection of the income derived from and the expenditure entailed by the endowments.†

Government service was not the monopoly of any class. It was open to all Government Service who possessed the requisite qualifications. A man who entered service as an ordinary clerk could rise to the rank of Wazir in course of time if he possessed the required qualifications for that post.‡ Every

* One who leads the congregational prayers among Musalmans is called Imām or Pesh Imām.

† T. V., 4, 5, S, 19, 189, 197, 271, 288, 308, 664, 538, S. A., 41, 121, T. Y., 332.

‡ T. V., 166. The administrative machinery was mainly in the hands of the Persians. Most of the Wazirs important appointment in the State was a matter of contract. Before taking charge of his office every high official had to enter into a Mawaza' or covenant or contract with his royal master. The terms and conditions of the covenant differed with different posts in proportion to their importance. An 'Aris' was, for instance, required to leave his son as a hostage before he was invested with the insignia of his office and sent out.*

The Indian territories conquered by the early Ghaznavid princes, were formed into a separate province, which was administered by two officials—Sipah Salar and Qazi. In the days of Mahmud, the Sipah Salar was 'Abdullah Qaratigin who resided at Lahore. 'Abdullah was a mild man and the administrative machinery was therefore controlled by the Qazi. But his successor, Ariyāraq, was a strong man who could not brook the interference of the Qazi in his affairs and would not like to play the second fiddle. The clash between the two was, therefore, inevitable. The Qazi Shirkāl, 'Abdul Hasan Ali, who knew the Sipah Salar too well, moved the Government of Ghiznī and secured the appointment of two more officials, vis., an 'Amil' and a Mushrif. When and departmental heads of the Ghaznavid Government were Persians. This is because they were superior to all others in diligence and obsequiousness (M.G., 131).

* T.V., 177-78, 326, 416, 453, 504

THE GHAZNAVID GOVERNMENT

even the appointment of these two officials did not exercise any check on the powers of Arīyāraq, the Qāzī mobilized the forces of intrigue against him and brought about his fall. He was successful in his object because the Sultān (Mas'ūd) was trying to get rid of the old and arrogant officials of his father's time.^{*} When Nīvālugin was appointed Sifah Sālār of India the Wazīr or Mas'ūd instructed him not to meddle with financial affairs but to leave them to the Qāzī. Thus, while the entire financial administration was placed in the hands of the Qāzī, the Sālār could not but force the Tākurs to pay tribute, to wage wars and to administer military affairs. The idea was the separation of civil from military affairs. The 'Amil and the Mušrif assisted the Qāzī. The clash between the Qāzī and the Sālār as well as the rebellion of the latter were responsible for the changes introduced by Mas'ūd. He appointed his own son, Majdūd, as Amir-i-Hind (Governor of India) and put a Dabir and a Mastaujī (accountant) at his disposal for help.[†] The Mastaujī was expected to control the income and expenditure. At the time of Mas'ūd there were the following officers at Lāhore. a

* T. V., 327-28, S. A. II A, 213.

† The original idea of keeping the military department strictly separate from the civil must have been much modified by the appointment of Prince Majdūd who represented his father, the Sultan, and was thus the head of the Indian Government.

Sipah-Salar who was a prince of the royal family, a Mastaifi, a Mushrif and a Dabir. There might have been a treasurer as well, though we do not find any mention about him in the contemporary records. This was then the nucleus round which the Wizarat Department developed in India. Further changes in the administration of India must have been introduced when the Ghaznawids transferred their seat of government from Ghazni to Lahore.*

The Finance Department of the Central Government has been referred to above †. The appointment as well as the dismissal of such local financial officers as the Salib-i-Dewan or provincial revenue minister, Mastaifi-i-Mumalik (Accountant General) the 'Amil (or Collector) and the Rais,‡ rested with the Central Government concentrated in the Sultan. The Central Revenue Department maintained a regular record of accounts of the Mal-i-Kharaj (revenue) sent to it from different provinces. The principles according to which the revenue of various places was assessed are not known, but it will not be far from the truth to say that the Ghaznawid Government relied on the records, whatever they were, of the rulers whom they supplanted. The contemporary works do not afford any clue to the actual measurement of land. The assessments recorded in the Central Financial Department furnished the basis of the demand of the Wasir for revenue from provincial and district revenue officers. The revenue due to the State was the first charge on the property of every person concerned with its collection. It was paid both in cash and kind. It was also paid in amber, pearls, cloth, utensils, etc. The Wasir, who was at the helm of all administrative affairs, was particularly keen on the realization of the amount of revenue recorded in his office as due from a place or a provincial officer *. There is no doubt that most of the defaulters were really incapable and dishonest and the Wasir's strictness was not misplaced, but it is quite reasonable to suppose that there must have been cases where the revenue due to the State could not be paid off owing to a good governor also ran the risk of punishment for no fault of his †. The revenue was not paid - in great vigour, but neither the Sultān nor his Wazir was slack to show leniency when he was convinced of the defaulter's inability to pay. There are also instances of successful protests and representations to the Central Government against unjust and unreasonable demands. Remissions were not grudged when there were good grounds for granting them. Whenever there was a drought or whenever a province suffered from the attack of an enemy, land revenue was remitted and loans were advanced to cultivators in order to enable them to purchase seeds, cattle and implements.*

* T. V., 327-28, 622, 666 67, S. A. M. A., 213 11.

† See supra, pp. 243 44.

‡ He was perhaps a local revenue officer (supervisor?) of a district or town.

Other sources of revenue were such taxes as Kharāj, Jizia and Zakāt, levied according to the laws of the Shariyat, tributes from dependencies and presents from subordinate Princes, the produce of gold and silver from mines and the duties of the great volume of trade that passed between China, Turkistān and India and Khurāsān, Irāq and Syria, supplemented by the spoils of wars, enormously enriched the State Treasury †. There are repeated references to Kharāj‡ in the contemporary accounts, which shows that it was a most important source of State income. Jizia§ was imposed on the

* T M, 144-46, 663, T Y, 247, 271, 321, S N 18, 206, C M

† S N, 20, M G, 133-34

‡ See S A M A, 242

§ For a discussion on Jizia, see S C A M R I

Zimmis in lieu of military service and for the protection of their person and property, and a record of the income received from this source was kept in the Revenue Office. *Zakat does not figure so prominently in the contemporary chronicles, but it must have been levied in some form or the other. It was 2½% tax on property. The revenue due from each province was sent to the Head Quarters by the officer concerned, and in cases of delay and default a Rasīl (agent) was sent by the Central Government with instructions to expedite remittance. At times the Wazir himself went to the defaulting province to see into its revenue affairs and to set them right. All amounts were sent to the Treasury, where the Khāzān (treasurer) examined the Nuskhā-i-Hujjat (demands) and gave a Khat (receipt) on receiving the amount. †

The State also undertook to mitigate the horrors of famines whenever they Famine Relief broke out. It sympathized with the famine-stricken and the impoverished and did all that it could to relieve them of their sufferings. Once, when a terrible famine broke out in Khurāṣān, Sulṭān Mahmūd issued orders to all Provincial Governors to send as much corn to the famine-stricken area as possible. Accordingly, huge quantities of food-stuffs began to pour into Khurāṣān from all over the

* S N , 20, M G , 133

† T M , 170, 314, S A M A , 240 ff

Ghaznawid Empire * With all the solicitude of the State for the comfort and convenience of the people, it must be remembered that modern means and methods of fighting famines were unknown in those times and the crude and unscientific means of communication and transportation must have formed a great obstacle in the proper administration of famine relief

With rare exceptions, the Ghaznawid Sultans Cultural progress were deeply interested in the progress of learning and literature, architecture and other fine arts. The University of Ghaznīn, with a vast library and a museum attached to it, was literally a light-house of learning, shedding its light far and wide and illuminating the East in general and Afghānistān in particular † The Arūs-i-Falak or 'the Celestial Bride', the loveliest house of prayer which had received the honorific appellation of 'the wonder of the east' in those days, was the finest gem of Islāmic architecture then in existence. Both these and many other magnificent monuments that adorned Ghaznīn were things of beauty, which if spared and preserved, would have been a joy for ever

* T Y , 247 (Tehrān edition, p 331), S A M A , 242

† The Ghaznawids systematically encouraged education by opening schools and colleges and extending their patronage to learned persons at a time when no government of the West had yet evolved a regular system of education (See E M J)

- Abul Mu'izz, 45
 Abu'l Muluk, title of Sultan Arslan Shah, 228
 Abu'l Ma'thil 'Abdul Mulk Javuni 110
 Abu'l Mu'azzir Nasr, 27, 140, 169
 Abu Qasim Ahmad bin Hasan al-Ma'mudi, War 'ar of Sultan Mahmud, 170 186 39
 Abu Qasim Siyajî, 19, 31, 32
 Abu Mansur, governor of Tas, 139
 Abu Mansur, a Samanid king, 3
 Abu Mansur Arslan Khan, 35
 Abu Nasr Muhammad bin Asadush-Shir, 38
 Abu Nasr Ahmad bin Muhammad bin 'Abdus-Sir in id., a Ghaznavid Wazir and governor, 192 93, 214 215
 Abu Rihân see Alberâni
 Abu Sa'id 'Abdul Malik bin Abu 'Umar, 171
 Abu Said Al-Qantish, 32
 Abu Tâlib bin Marwanî, Khwâja, 214
 Administration, under Mahmûd, 175 79 — the Ghaznavid, 237 ff., administration of towns, 256
 Afshinid, 2, 7, 9, 10, 232, 235 248
 Afshins, 4, their rule, 9, — alliance with Irâzin Rûz, 10 11 — independence, 11 12, attacked and defeated by Mahmûd, 44, 221 22
 Afshînî ibî Turks see Qu'i Khwâns
Mâdîth (Traditions), 109 10
 Ahmad (officer under Mâmid) 177
 Ahmad bin Ismâ'il, Samanid King, 2
 Ahmad bin Muhammad, 213
 Ahmad bin Muhammad bin Abî Bakr al-Isfahâni, 139
 Ahmad Hasan, Khwâja, 197 99 206 10
 Ahmad Nâridîgân, 197 202
 Ahmad Tughlîq Khan, 35
 Ajmer, 15 59 73
 Ajdhar (Pîk Pîtan), 226
 Ali ud-Daulah, 193, 195
 'Ali ud-Daulah bin Kâkitwâh, 48
 'Alî ud-Dîn Hu-sîn Jâdatân id., 124 destruction of Ghaznîa by him, 231
 'Alî ud-Dîn of Ghâzî, 233
 Al-'Arâj, see Ni'mâ
 Alberâni, Abu 'Iâd bin Muhammâd bin 'Alîd, 115 16 on Imamâ, 157 210 11
 Alexander the Great, 25 109 179
Allâh o Malâhum marrat qâla 'l-hâfi, the, 131
 'Alî 'In Pîlîm Pîlî — table of Ghaznîa, 21 22

- 'Alī Hujārī, Sayyad, 102
 'Alī Nūshīgīn, 171
 'Alītigīn, ruler of Bulkhārā, 35-36, 39, 195, 205
Allāhō Akbar, 80, 108
 Alp Arslān bin Chaqar Beg Dāud, 225-26
 Alptigīn, ruler of Ghaznīn, 2-4, 7, 11, 23, 49, 240
 Al Qādir Billah, Khalīfa of Baghdād, 41
Al Qānūn-i-Has'ūdī, 116
 Altūntash, Amir Hājib, 38, 42, 195, 205
 Altūntash, see Abu Sa'īd
 'Amil, duties of, 255-56, 260
Amin ul-Villah wa Yamīn ud-Daulah, title of Sultān Mahmūd, 31
 Amir, title of early Ghaznawids, 41-2.
Amir-i-Hāras (chief jailor), 257
 Amir Ma'zī, see Ma'zī
 Anandpāl, son of Rāja Jaipāl, 53, defeated by Mahmūd, 59-61, recovers power, 62, intervenes for Thānesar, 63-64, 71
 Anhilwāra, captured by Sultān Mahmūd, 78-82
Anwār-i-Suhailī, the, 235
 Arabic, superseded by Persian, 113
 Arabs, 1, 117
 Aral Sea, 174
 Architecture, of Mahmūd, 123-24, — of other Ghaznawid kings, 264
 Arūtigīn, a general, 218-19
 Arīyārāq, governor of India, 197, 258-59
Arīz, Sālib-i-Dīwān-i, 192
 Arjan, a feudatory of Rāja Gāndā, 14
 Army of the Ghaznawids, 245-47, — officers, 247-48
 Arslān Khān, governor of Tūs, 139
 Arslān Shāh, Sultān of Ghaznīn, 228-31
'Arūs-i-Falāk (or Celestial Bride), 122, 179, 264
 Asad ush-Shārī, 38
 Asadī Tūsī, a poet, 121
 Asjadī Marvī, a poet, 121
 Asāl, a fort in India, 70
Asār-ul-Bāqīa, the, 116
 Ash'as bin Muhammad, 3
 Asīnī, 70, f n
Askudārs (mounted couriers), 254
 Asīghtigīn, 197
Atīshkāda-i-Azār, the, 141
 Attār, Shaikh, 128
 Augustus, Cæsar, 109
Awqāf, Dīwān-i, 253
 Avicenna, see Abu 'Alī Sīna.
 Ayāz, Abū Najam Ayāz, his relations with Sultān Mahmūd, 130 ff
 Baganga, river, 62
 Baghdād, 48, 91, 93, praised in the Shāhnāmāh, 142, 174, system of government in —, 242-43
 Bahlol Dāna, shrine of, 128

- Ghāzīs, (holy warriors), 246
 Ghaznīn, 3, 4, 5, 8, 9, invaded by Hindūs, 9, 16, 17, 19, 24, 25, 27, 32, 38, 41 ff,—Past and Present, 124, tombs and towers at —, 124-26, 126-28, shrines at —, 128, 174, 206, 215, 223, conquered by Sultān Sanjar, 230, invaded by Turkomāns, 235, 236
Ghiyās-ud-Dīn of Ghūr, Sultān, 236
Ghūr, 26, conquered by Mahmūd, 42-43, 174, 197, 206, 216, 220, 235, 236
Ghūrak, fort, 63
Ghūrids, 42, 132, 166, Bahram Shāh's war with them, 232, 236
Ghurrat uz-Zijāt, the, 116
Ghuzz Turkomāns 235
Ghuzz desert, 33
Gīrī, fort, 207
 Greek sciences, 211
 Government of Ghaznīn, 237 ff, functions of —, 238-39, Central—, 242-43, Provincial—, 255-56, Muslim —, 237-38
Gwālior, 59, conquered by Mahmūd, 74-75, 174

Hajib, (military rank), 247
Hājib Qīnījī, 41
Hajrāi, Hindū general, 101
Hakīm, Khalīfā, 92
Halosar, Wāṣir, 153
Hamadān, 143, 194
Hamīd, Shaikh, chief of Afghāns, 11
Hānsī, captured by Mas'ūd, 203-4, 208, 217
Hara Data, a Hindū Rāja, 67
Harūn, governor of Khwārizm, 192-93, 195-96
Hasanak, see Abū 'Alī Hasan Hasan bin Mehrān, 225
Hasan Ghaznawī, Sayyad, 234
Herāt, 17-18, 20, 28-30, 205, 216
 Hindūs, their aggression and defeat, 5, 21, defeated by Mahmūd, 51 ff,—under the Ghaznawids, 239-40
Hindū Shāhiya Dynasty, end of —, 73-74, 174,
 Hussain, grandson of Prophet Muhammad, 90
 Hussain, bin Qatīb, governor of Tūs, 139

Ibn-i-Khaldun, on Somnāth expedition, 76,—77
Ibn-i-Khalkān, on Mahmūd, 110
Ibn-ul-Asīr, on Somnāth expedition, 76, 160
Ibrāhīm bin Marzūbān, 47
Ibrāhīm, Sultān of Ghaznīn, 224, 226-27
 Idolatory, Mahmūd's efforts against, 102-4
Ilak Khān, ruler of Bukhārā, 19, 32-35 43, 58, 63
 India, Subuktigīn's invasions

INDEX

- of —, 15-16, Mahmūd's —, 49-83, causes of Indian invasions, 85 ff, results —, 106-7, effects—107-8, 174
 Indian Ocean, 174
 Indian Province, under Mas'ud 197-202, 207, 216, 217, 230, 258-60
 Indus, the river, 44, 60, 81, islands of—, conquered by Mahmūd, 83, 207
 Iraj, 142
 Irān, 101
 Irāq, 174, 263
 Isā, 193
 Isā, bīn Ma'adan, 45-46
 Isfahān 48, 93, 113, 139, 174, 185, 194
 Ishāq bīn Alptugīn, 240
Ishrāf-i-Awqāf, 257.
Ishrāf-i-Mumlukat-i-Khāṣ, 249-50
 Islām, propagation of —, by Mahmūd, 97, ff, how presented in India, 99-100, 108
 Ismā'il Sāmānid, 2
 Ismā'il bīn Mahmūd bīn Subuktigīn, 26-29, 169
 Isrā'il bīn Saljūq, 39
 Izad Shāh bīn Sultān Abul Hasan 'Alī, 232

Jaipal, Rāja of Lāhore, 9, alliance with Afghāns, 10, invasion of Ghaznīn and defeat, 12-14, treaty, perfidy and punishment, 15-16, 21, 26, 49, defeated by Mahmūd, 50, 53, 85
Jāish (army), 247
 Jami-Aulīvā, shrine of, 128
 Jāts, the, 82, defeated by Sultān Mahmūd, 83
Jauhar (rite), 70 f n
 Jibāl, 45, 174
Jihād (defensive war), 45 78, Qurānic conception of —, 94-96, Mahmūd's invasions of India distinguished from —, 95 ff, 173
Jisīā (tax), 262-63
 Jūq, father of Subuktigīn, 7
 Jurjān, 32, 44, 174, 194, 196
 Jurjānniyah, 36, 38
 Justice, Mahmūd's sense of —, 170-71, administration of —, 251-53
 Jūzjānān, 29, 41, 169

Kabul, 4
 Kāfiristān 174
 Kāh Kālī, sister of Sultān Mahmūd, 37
 Kaikāüs, see 'Unsar-ul-Ma'ali
 Kālanjar, a fort near Kashmīr, 39
Kalila wa Damanī, the, 235
 Kālinjar, a fort in Bundhelkhand, 15, 59, 71-75, 174
 Kālisaraq, 225
 Kāmil, see Ibn-ul-Asīr
 Kanauj, 15, 45, 59, 69, 71, 72, 174
 Kāngra, 61, 62, 222
 Karanātūlaka, the, 116
 Karbalā, desert of, 90

- Kurrāmite creed, 90
 Kishgarh, 34-36, 38, 58-59
 Kashmīr, 57, — Pass, 65-66,
 174
 Katar, 34
 Kūthiāwār, conquered by Mahmūd, 75 82, 158
 Khafīs, ruler of Mansūra, 81
Khail, — tāsh, 247
 Khalaf bin Ahmad, 40 41
 Khālanjān, 139
 Khalīfā (s) of Baghdād, 48,
 49, 91-93, 107, 181, 191,
 237 — of Cairo, 42, 174
 Khiljīs, 34
 Khāns of Turkistān, Mahmūd's dealings with —, 33-37
 Khāqānī, (swami) tomb of, 128
Kharāj (tax), 26
 Kharqānī, see Abū Ḥīṣān
 Khargushī, see Abū Sīd
 Abdul Mālik bin Abū
 'Usmān
Khāzān, (treasurer), 255, 263
Khatib, 257
Khulāfat, (Caliphate), 92
 Khoristān, 194
 Khulam Pīss, 3
 Khurāsān, 2, 3, 7, 18, 22,
 32-35, 39, 51, 62, 63, 92,
 113, 178, 204, 225, 235,
 262 63
 Khusrāu Malik, Sultān of Ghaznīn, 2-6
 Khusrāu Shāh, Sultān of Ghaznīn, 225
Khutba, 37, 38, 257
Khutbān, 174
 Khwābīn, captured by Sul-tān Mahmūd, 43
 Khwārzīm, 32, 37, 174, 193, 196
 Khwārzīm Shāh, 58
 Khyber Pass, 4, 13, captured by Mahmūd, 60
 Kirmān, conquered by Mas'- ūd, 193, 233
Kitāb fi Ghurār-i-Mumlikat
 -i-Fūrs, 117
Kitāb ul Yamīn, 117
Kotwāl, duties of, 256
 Krishṇa, Śrī, 68
 Kshatriś, 13
 Kuhistān, 31
 Kūl Chand, Rāja, 67 68
 Kurmaj, 8, 10
 Lahore, 21, 72, 73, 85, 178,
 215, 217, 218, 222-23, 227-
 28, 235, 236, 258-260
 Lamgān, 7, 13, 26, 49, 174
 Law of succession, 240-42
 Lāwīk, see Abū 'Alī and Abū Bakr
Lingams, (phalli), of Som-nāth, 73, 157
 Libraries, 11, 123
 Lohārīn, 66 f n
 Lohīkotta, see Lohkot,
 Lohkot, 67
Lubāb-ul Albāb, on Sultān
 Mahmūd, 109 10
 Lutf Alī Azar, Allāma, 143
Ma'dan, 45

- Madrasahs* (colleges), 122, 235, 255
Mahāban, (in Muttra) 67
Māhipāl, Rāja of Delhi, 210-18
 Mahmūd, Abul Qāsim, Sultān of Ghaznīn, 8, 17, 18, 20, early life, 24-26, struggle for succession, 26-29, relations with Sāmānid, 29-33, — Khāns of Turkistān, 33-36, — Māmūnid, 36-38, conquest of Gharshistān, 38-39, rise of Saljuqs, 39-40, conquest of Sīstān, 40-41, assumption of title of 'Sultān' 41-42, conquest of Ghūr, 42-43, — Qusdār, 43, — valleys of Nūr and Qīrāt, 43-44, expedition against Afghāns, 44, relations with Zīvārid, 44-45, — rulers of Mekrān, 45-46, conquest of Rāv, Hamadān and Isfahān, 46-48, invasions of India, 49-83, Khyber Pass, 50, Peshāwar, 50-53, Bhātiya, 53-56, Multān, 56-58, Bhātiya 58-59, Punjāb, 59-61, Nagarkot, 61-63, Narāyan or Narāvanpur, 62, Multān, 63, Thānesar, 63-64, Nandāna, 65-66, Kashmīr, 65, Baran, etc., 67-72, Kanauj and Kālinjar, 71-73, Punjāb, 73-74, Gwākor and Kālinjar, 74-75, Somnāth, 75-82, islands of the Indus, 82-83, Motives of Indian invasions, 84-108, political factors, 85-87, economic, 87-88, religious—, 88-94, Jihāds (?) 94-97, propagation of Islām (?), 97-102, conquest (?) 104-5, inspiring motive, 105-6, results of Indian invasions, 166-67, effects —, 167-8, cultural activities, 109-28, Mahmūd's love of learning, 109-10, — patronage of letters, 110-11, renaissance of Persian literature, 112-14, encouragement of education, art and architecture, 122-28, legends about him, 129-60, relations with Firdausi, 150-51, charge of bastardy, 150-51, relations with Ayāz, 152-56, Somnāth, 156-58, Dābīshlīm, 158-60, Mahmūd's illness and death, 161-62, review of riches and grief, 162-64, character, 166-67, personal appearance, 167-68, virtues, 168-72, religious beliefs, 172-75, as a soldier, 173-75, — king, 175-79, weaknesses, 179-82, estimate, 182, his tomb, 125, Tower of Victory, 127, 194-95, 197, 198-204, 223-24, 235, 239, 253,

- 263, 237, 241, 242
 Mahmūd bin Maudūd, 218
 Mahmūd-i-Zabūlī, 24, 151
 Mahmūd-ul-Warrāq, an historian, 118
 Maimandī, see Ahmad bin Hasan Majallat, the, 118,
 Majdūd bin Mas'ūd, 207 208
 Majdūd (Hakīm Sanāī), 128
 Majd ud-Daulah bin Fakhrudd Daulah, 46, 194 95
 Majhāwan, see Munj
Majmā-ul Fusahā, the, 141
Makhsan i Asrār, 234
Maktabs (schools) 122, 235, 253
Malak-us-Shu'ra, (poet-laureate), 121
 Malak Shāh bin Alp Arslān, 226
 Māmūnid, their relations with Mahmūd, 36-38
 Manaich, 70 f n
 Manī'i, see Abul Hasan
 Mansūr bin Maudūd, 218
 Mansūr bin Nuh 2, 3
 Mansūra, 81
Maqāmat-i-Abū Nasr Muškānī, the, 118
 Mardān Shāh b/o Sultān Abul Hasan 'Alī, 222
 Marv, 30, 31, 205, 206, — rūd, 30
 Marzubān bin Hasan, 47
 Mastang (in Baluchistan) 39
Mastawī i-Mumālik, 260
 Mas'ūd I bin Mahmūd, Sultan of Ghaznīn, +0, 43, 47, 48, 93, sued in a court, 171, 181, 182, 183, struggle for succession, 184 86, release and reinstatement of Maimandī, 186 89, execution of Hasanak, 189 92, appointment of a new Wazir, 192-93, conquest of Mekrān and Kirmān, 193-94, rebellion of 'Alā ud Daulah, 194, — Majd ud-Daulah, 194-95, recovery and loss of Khwārzim, 195 96, subjugation of Jurjān and Tabaristān, 196-97, condition of India, 197 202, capture of Hānsī and Sonpat, 203-4, war with the Saljuqs, 204-6, flight to India, 207-8, Wizārat department under him, 208-10, patronage of learning and promotion of education, 210 11, character and estimate, 211 12, 213, 241
 Mas'ūd II, Abū Ja'far, 221
 Mas'ūd III, 'Alā-ud-Daulah, Sultan of Ghaznīn 227-28
 Maudūd bin Mas'ūd, Sultan of Ghaznīn, appointed governor of Balkh, 207, appointment of Wazirs, 214, — governor of the Punjab, 214-15, recovery of Transoxiana, 215 16, condition of India, 216-18, campaign against the

- the Saljuqs, 218-20
Mawāṣir (convenient or contract of service), 237-58
 Ma'zī, see Amīr Ma'zī
 Mecca, 93, 173
 Mekrān, 45-46, 174, conquered by Mas'ūd I, 193
 Ministers, see Wazirs
 Minūchihr, a poet 121
Minūchihr bin Qābus bin Wāshmīr 45, 148
 Mosques, 108, 233
 Motives of Mahmūd's Indian invasions, 84-106
 Muīwīri, Ommāvade Khalīfī, responsible for secularization of Islamic State, 97, 183
Mudhera (Mundher), 79
Mughīs al-Khalq fi Ikhīyār-al-Haq, the, 110
Muhammad bin 'Alī, an historian, 50
Muhammad of Ghūr, see Shīkhāb ud Dīn Muhammad of Ghūr
Muhammad Lashkārī, 139
Muhammad Khān Qazwīnī, 142
Muhammad bin Sultān Mahmūd, 181, defeated and imprisoned by Mas'ūd I, 183-85, 195, 241
Muhammad bin Sūrī, ruler of Mandish, 42
Muhammad Sultān bin Ma'lak Shāh, 229
Muhtasib, 180, Dīwān i-, Muhtasib, 253, duties of— 256-57
Mujāhids (holy warriors) 96
 Muīn-ad-Dīn Chishtī, 102
 Multān, 33, conquered by Mahmūd, 56-58, 59, reduced by —, 63, 78, 105, 174, 222, 236
Mumlikat i Khās, Dīwān i- 260
Mundher (Mudher), 79
 Munj, 6^a, 70
 Muntasīr, see Abū Ibrāhīm Ismā'il al Muntasīr
Muqaddam : Pillānān, 246
Mushrifīs, 249-50, 248-59
Mushrifān i-Dārgāh, 249
 Music, 212
 Mu'tazilites, persecution of, 46
 Mutīr, 67-68
Nagarhar, 213
Nagarkot, captured by Mahmūd, 61 62, 217, 222
Nāgaur (in Swālīk), 231
Nāib i-'Arz, his duties, 245
Nāmī, governor of the Punjab, 214-15
Nandā, see Ganda
Nandāna, 62, captured by Mahmūd, 65-66
Napoleon, 111
Nīrāvan (pn̄), conquered by Mahmūd, 62, 174
Nīsar, a Wazīr, 142
Nasir-ud Dīn-wad-Daulat, title of Subuktigin, 18
Nasr bin Ahmad, 2
Nasr bin Mahmūd, 183

THE GHAZNAWIDS

410

- Nasr bin Subuktigín, 41
 Nasr, the Hájjí, 6-7
 Náth, a Hindu general in Muslim army, 200
 Náuroz (festival), 113, 224
 Nawar, the river, 174
 Náwása Sháh, see Sukhpál
 Nishápúr, 18, 19, 26, 27, 29, 32, 48, 134, 205
 Niyítigín, see Ahmad
 Nizámí al Aruzí al Samár qandí, on Mahmúd and Firdausí, 132-35, — satire, 144-46, — Ayáz, 153
 Nizámí, Shaikh, 234
 Nah, Amir of Bukhárá, 2, 16, 17, 19, 32
 Nar, the river, 43-44
 Nashtigín Káj, 28 29, 10^a Nashtigín Karkhí, 223-24, 225.
 Ommayades, 89-90, 183
 Oxus, the river, 39, 104, bridge over —, 124
 Pand Námah, the, 25
 Parichehra, 142
 Paris, 111
 Pástán Námah, 138-39
 Persia, 110, 'Aráb conquest of —, 112 13
 Persian, language, 6, renaissance of —, 110 ff., — influence, 112 ff. — literature, 110 ff.
 Pesháwar, 4, 10, 16, conquered by Subuktigín, 16, — Mahmúd, 50 53, 57, 107, 218, 221, 223, 236
Pesh-Imám (one who leads Muslim prayers), 257
 Pírí (Piritigin), ruler of Ghaznín 4-5, 240
 Poetry, progress of —, under Mahmúd, 119 ff.
 Poets, 119 ff.
 Postal system, see Sáhib-i-Bárid
 Provincial Government, 255-256
 Public works of Sultán Mahmúd, 123 24
 Punishments, 253
 Punjab, the, attacked by Mahmúd, 59, 61, 67, 72, annexed to the Ghaznawid Empire, 73 74, 105, 214 15, 216, 222
 Qabus bin Washmgír, 44, 45
 Qádir Billah, Al-, Khalifa of Brígídád, relations with Mahmúd, 31, 41, 91 93
 Qádir Khán, see Yasuf Qádir Khán
 Qáid (military rank), 247
 Qánsúf-i-Más'údí, the, 116
 Qara-Khánids, 33
 Quratigín, 'Abdullah, 258
 Qatwán, 19
 Qási (-ul Quzzát), 252-53, 257-58
 Qazwín, 48
 Qírát, the river, 43-44
 Qubádián, 174
 Qusdár, conquered by Subuktigín, 9, 35, — Mahmúd,

- 43, 174, 219 220
Qutb-Umār at Delhi, 127
 Qutb ud-Dīn Muhammad
 Sultan of Ghur 232
- Rahib, see Ruhut
 Rāj Hindū, 101
 Raīs (revenue collector), 200
 Rāv 18, 25, 40, 93, 104 05
 Rājpūtāni 80, 104
 Rājpūts, 107
 Rājvīpīl, 50 71-72
 Rāmrājī 61
 Rāmganga, see Ruhut Ramzān b n Yūsuf (Shīh Rūm), shrine of —, 128
 Rāuz-i-Sultān a village in Ghaznīn, 125
 Rāuzat us Sifā, the, 211
 Renaissance of Persian literature 112, ff
 Revenue officers,— system, 200 ff
 Rūdikī a poet 114
 Ruhut (Rāhib), river, 72
 Rūpāl, 227
- Sā'idi, a poet, 128
 Saghānivān, 174
 Sāl ib : Barid, 254
 Sāl ib : Dīwān, 255
 Sāhib i-Dīwān i- Arz, 245
 Sāhib i-Dīwān-i-Auqāj 255
 Sāhib-i Dīwān-i-Ishrāf i-Yamlikat, 240-50
 Sāhib i-Dīwān-i-Risālat, 247
 Sāhib i Dīwān i-Wikālat,
- 243, 250-51
 Sāif-ud-Daulah, title of Sultān Mahmūd, 18
 Sufi-ud-Dīn, of Ghur, attacked Ghaznīn, 233
 Sākīna Sūhā, (Buddha), 44
 Sāfir of Dūlam, 47
 Sālīr Hussain, 231-32
 Sāljūqs, their rise, 30-40, + 161, 164, 100 Mas'ud's campaign against them, 264-5, 215-16, Māudūd's
 — 218-20, 225-27
- Salt Range 62
 Sāmānidē the, 2, 3, 8, 16 ff;
 22-23 26-27 relations with Mahmūd, 20-33, 36, 39 113, as patrons of Persian literature, 174
- Samarqānd, 35, 93
 Sāmbhar, 81
 Sānai see Majdūd
 Sangramarājā, a ruler of Kishmīr, 65-66
 Sanjar, Sultān, 227-9, 235
 Sarakhs, 30, 32
 Sarhang, 247
 Sarjāhān, 46
 Sāruqāb, governor of Nandīnā 66
 Sāti, practised by Hindus in Ghaznīn, 104
 Satire, on Mahmūd, 144-48
 Service, Government, 257 8
 Seunra, 70
 Shāh of Kābul, 4-5
 Shahāb-ud Dīn Muhammad of Ghur, 236
 Shāh Malak, sent against

- Hārūn, 196
- Shāh Muhammad-ash Shār, ruler of Gharshīstān, 38
- Shāhnāmeh, 119, 121, 130
31, discrepancies in—, 135
40, authorship of —, 141-44, 146, 149-50, changes in — 141-44
- Shāhrarūr, 46
- Shāh Rām, see Ramzān bin
Yūsuf
- Shaikh Attār, shrine of, 128
- Shams ul-'Arīfīn, shrine of, 128
- Shams ul-Kufāt*, title, see Naimandī
- Shams ul Ma'ālī Abul Qāsim
Qibās bin Washmīgīr bin
Zīvār, 44
- Sharwa, 70
- Sherzād, Sultān of Ghaznīn 228
- Shujī', prince, 224
- Sharijat* (Muslim law), 102, 154, 175, 253
- Shī'a's, 148
- Shīhra (Muhtasib), 256
- Shīrāzī Qazī, the, see Abul Hasan
- Shūrūn, 10
- Shrines at Ghaznīn, 128
- Sīalkot, 220
- Sind, 1, desert of—, 81, 105, 174, 222
- Sīphīh Sālār (military rank), 236, 247, 258
- Sīrsāwa, 67
- Sīstān, 7, conquest of — by Mahmud 40-41, 45, 216,
- 223
- Somnāth, 36, 45, conquered
by Mahmūd, 75-82, idol of — broken by Mahmūd, 80, 130, story of breaking the idol, 156-58, 160
- Someshwar*, idol, 79
- Sonī, 101
- Sonpat, captured by Sultān
Mahmūd, 204
- Sriswāgarh, 70 f n
- State, Qurānic conception of, 89, under Mahmūd, 89,
—Ommayades, 89-90, —
Sultān Mahmūd, 96-97,
Persian — 113
- Subāshitigīn, 33
- Subuktigīn, Amir of Ghaz nīn, 5, his reign, 6 ff, con quest of Bust, 8, — Qusdār 9, relations with the Af
ghāns, 9-12, — Jaupāl of Lāhore, 12-15, — the Sāmānids, 16-20, charac ter and estimate, 20-22, 24, 26, 44, 45, 49, 50, 53,
85, 106, 107, tomb of Subuktigīn, 125, 146, his mistake re succession 169, 224, 241
- Sukhpāl (Nawāsa Shāh),
58-59
- Sultān, title, 41-42, pow ers of — 27-28, limita tions — 237-38
- Sunnīs, 92
- Sutlej, the river, 64
- Syria, 263
- Tab, north-west part of

INDEX

- Ghūr 43
 Tabaristān, 44-45, 144, 174, 194, 196
Ta'bir, 113
Tasrif ul Furū', a book attributed to Sultān Māh-mūd, 110
Tahir bin Wālī ud Daulah, governor of Sistān, 40
Talqiq mī'l Hind, 115
Tashkira i Haft Aqālim, 1+1
Tārikh i Takriti, 113
 Taxes, 262-63
 Temples why, when and where destroyed, 102-104
 Thanesar, captured by Māh-
 mūd, 63-4, 217
 Tilak, a Hindu general of Muslim army, 200, his rise, 202-3
 Tirmiz, 29
 Toleration, under Mahmūd,
 100-104, — Mas'ud, 210,
 — other Ghaznuids, 239-240
 Transoxiana, 2, 32, 36, 39, 40, 101, 113, 205, 216
 Treasury, Government, 255
 Trilochanpāl, son of Anandpāl, 50-60, defeated by Mahmūd, 65-66, flight to Kashmir, 65-66, 71
 Tughān, ruler of Bust, 8, 21
 Tughāntigīn, Sīzūh Sālār of Lāhore, 227
 Tughral, Ghaznawid commander, 919-220
 Tughral, 'the Ingrate', 223
 2+, 241
 Tughral Beg, Sāljuq, 106,
 205, 210, 216
 Turks, 5
 Turkistān, 6, 8, 39, 113, 263
 Turkomāns, 195, 205, 255.
 Tūs, 158-59, 148-49
- Ujjain, 59
Ulāmā, hired by leaders of sūfīn, 110, 22
 Ulughbeg, tomb of —, 126
 Umr, 79
 University of Sultān Māh-mūd at Ghaznīn, 179, 264
 Unsari, Hasūn bin Ahmad, 120
 'Unsur ul Mīali Kālkāus, 148
 'Usmān, Khalīfa, 6
 Ubti, Abū Nasar Muhammad bin Muhammad, al-Jabbar-al —, 116-17
- Vidbyadhara, 71
 Vijayananda son of Javananda, 116
 Viramā, see Virvārāma.
 Virvārāma, Rāja of Sām-bhar, 81
- Waihand, 10, 49, 52, 60
 Wakīl, 250
 Wālī-ud-Daulah, 40
 Walwālīj, 18
 Wasā'i-Nizām ul-Mulk, the, 159
 Washmgir, 44
 Wāsīr, under Mahmūd, 175-
 79, — Mas'ud, 192-93, —,

THE GHAZNAWIDS

- others, 208 10, 261 62
- Yamin-ud-Daulah wa Amīn ul-Millāh, title of Sultān Mahmūd, 76
- Yazd Jard, the last Sāsānid King of Persia, 6
- Yusuf Qādir Khān, ruler of Kāshgarh, 34, 36
- Zabulistan, 23, 146, 151
- Zāl Tajārib ul Umarī, the, 118
- Zainab, daughter of Sultān Mahmūd, 36
- Zalāt (tax), 172, 262 63
- Zamīn Dāvar, 25
- Zanjān, 46
- Zimmī (non - Muslims), under Sultān Mahmūd, 98 ff., 180, — other Ghaznavids, 239-40
- Zinat ul Ḥuttāb, the, 118
- Zivārids, their relations with Mahmūd, 44-45, 196
- Zullullah, 238
—
-

BOOKS BY THE SAME AUTHOR

"in Muslim India" and "The Mughal Empire from Babar to Aurangzeb" has already shown that he is equal to the task of dealing with Indian history from a correct and unbiased view-point. Thus the book under review is the third of the series, and as a matter of fact surpasses Mr Jaffar's previous works in breadth of view, erudition and logical sequence. After reading Mr Jaffar's book one is almost shocked how much is hidden from the common view which would go to add a hundred times to the glory that was Ind in the Middle Ages. Mr Jaffar has done ample justice to the subject he has taken up. He has conclusively proved that the Middle Ages of Indian history, when Indian Muslim Kings and Emperors ruled the land, was not a period of history dominated by a foreign people, but was a phase of the action and reaction which has produced Indian Culture as we know it and of which the Indian patriot of whatever religious belief might well be proud."

The Pioneer, Lucknow —

"In this book the author has summed up the cultural achievements of Muslim rule in India. If true facts about Muslim rule in India were made known to the Hindus much of their existing bitterness towards their Muslim fellow countrymen would quickly disappear. Mr Jaffar's book should be read by all those who are anxious to learn the truth about Muslim rule in India."

The Hindustan Review, Patna —

"The author of this book has also written some other volumes dealing with Muslim affairs. He has now turned his attention to a subject of great interest to all Indians. There is doubtless need now a days for a cultural history of Muslim India which Mr Jaffar's work attempts to meet. This well written book deserves serious study at the hands of all students of Indo Muslim culture as it brings into prominent relief some of its leading characteristic features."

EDUCATION IN MUSLIM INDIA

(1000—1800 A. C.)

(Cloth bound, pp. 261 + viii (8 Vo Crown) Price Rs. 5/8)

Professor H. K. Sherwani M.A. (Oxon), F.R.Hist.S., F.R.S., A., etc., Head of the Department of History and Politics Usmania University Hyderabad (Deccan)
in his Foreword to the book writes —

"I believe it was Froude who once said something to the effect that one should not raise one's pen to write unless one can add to human knowledge and there is no doubt that Mr S. M. Jaffar has done a great service to the cause of education in general and Indian culture in particular by writing this book on 'Education in Muslim India' and thus made a distinctive contribution to the field of Indian historical literature."

"I am very glad to find that Mr Jaffar has brought out these and many other equally important and attractive traits in his valuable work by tapping the information contained in the contemporary chronicles and has thus filled a long-felt want. I am sure that the book will be of great use to the student of Indian history as well as to the general reader, and trust that it will receive the recognition it so fully deserves."

Extracts from some other opinions

Rt Hon Sir Akbar Hyderi, Kt., P.C., etc. —

"I congratulate you (author) on the results of your labours. The sincerity of scholarship with which the material has been handled places your book in a position, I should think, to bear valuable testimony to the progress and vitality of cultural India under the ægis of the Muslim Kings in India. I hope the book is receiving the welcome it so thoroughly deserves."

Dr Sir Zia ud Din Ahmad Kt, C I E, M A, Ph D, D Sc, ex-Vice-Chancellor, Muslim University, Aligarh —

“ I have read with great pleasure and profit an excellent treatise I heartily congratulate its author on the merits of this important achievement ”

Dr P K Acharya, I E S, M A, Ph D, D Lit (London), Head of Oriental Departments, University of Allahabad —

The book will supply educationists and general public with a store of useful information all will be grateful to him (author) for his patient research and an interesting picture he has drawn a neatly printed volume will be treasured by all educationists ”

H L O Garrett, Esqr, C I E, I C S (retired), M A, F R Hist S, London —

“ He (author) has made a most useful contribution to the study of Muslim Rule in India ”

Dr Beni Prasad M A, Ph D, D Sc (London), University of Allahabad —

“ It is a very careful, painstaking and scholarly piece of work and should be welcome to students of Indian history ”

Dr. K G Sayyidain, D Ed, Director of Education, Jammu and Kashmir —

“ Highly interesting and valuable book hasten to offer you my congratulations on completing a very useful piece of work Students of Indian educational history should be grateful to you for this work ”

Dr Zakir Hussain, M A, Ph D, Principal, Jamia Millia, Delhi —

“ Your admirable study Students of Indian history will welcome this treatise as a useful guide a valuable contribution to Indian historical literature ”

THE MUGHAL EMPIRE FROM BABUR TO AURANGZEB

(Cloth bound pp 44 + viii (8 10 Crown) Price Rs 5/-)

Extracts from Sir Abdul Qadir's Introduction —

" Students of Indian history owe a debt of gratitude to Mr S M Iftikhar of Peshawar for his book which gives a very readable account of 'The Mughal Empire', opening with the reign of Babur and coming down to Aurangzeb. Mr Iftikhar has taken great pains to study the numerous books on the subject that are available in English, Persian and Urdu and has beautifully summarised the material contained in them. The long list of books used or consulted by him, given at the end of his valuable work, will show the range of his vast study and research. The result is a book considerably different from and decidedly superior in treatment and style to the existing text-books on Indian history.

" It can be safely said that the author has succeeded in giving to the students of Indian history an accurate as well as an instructive account of the Mughal Rule in India in its prime days. The book is a most useful contribution to Indian historical literature and should interest not only the general reader but also students of history in schools and colleges."

EXTRACTS FROM OTHER OPINIONS

Dr Sir Shafiqat Ahmad Khan Kt, D Lit, F R Hist S, University of Aligarh —

"I have read 'The Mughal Empire' with great interest. The book displays great erudition and industry, and is marked by an originality of treatment and freshness of outlook which are complete contrast to the existing works on the subject. I am greatly impressed with the book."

Dr E G Carpani, Ph D, The Indian Research Institute, (Italian Branch), Bologna, Italy —

" I cannot but congratulate you (author) on the excellent work you have done Your able and scholarly investigations are a valuable and welcome contribution to the study of Indian history and culture, throwing much light on its dark places I entertain a very high opinion of your publications "

Professor H K Sherwani, M A, (Oxon), F R Hist S, etc, Usmania University, Hyderabad, Deccan —

" Your excellent book fills a gap in books on Indian history in that it delineates the episodes of the Mughal era from an unprejudiced and correct view-point, bringing out the cultural aspect of that unique period I heartily congratulate you on your achievement "

Islamic Culture, Hyderabad Deccan —

" As far as it goes, his book is a useful corrective to several existing books on the period In a concise and lucid manner, he tells the story of Mughal rule in India, its splendour, its tolerance, its concern for the people of all classes and creeds, its justice and cultural greatness—all find a place in the description He is scrupulously fair to the Rajputs, the Sikhs and the Marathas, and his zeal for Islam does not blind him to the beauty and greatness of other creeds There is no other book which, in the same compass, gives such a clear picture of the period "

Asiatic Review, London —

" an able and conscientious volume wherein is gathered up perhaps all that history knows of Mughal Rule in India "

The Pioneer, Lucknow —

" Mr Jaffar deserves credit for giving an honest account of the historical facts that dawned with Babar and reached their climax in the reign of Aurangzeb It becomes obvious to the reader of 'The Mughal Empire' that original sources have been tapped and statements in the book are based on a deep and impartial study of authorities "

